Style.—Old Style, New Style: the methods of reckoning time according to the Julian calendar and the Gregorian calendar respectively. The Julian calendar was instituted by Julius Cæsar in 46 B. C. It provided for normal years of 365 days, every fourth year being reckoned as a leap year, with 366 days. As slightly modified by Augustus, it was used throughout the Christian world until replaced by the Gregorian calendar, promulgated by Pope Gregory XIII in 1582. According to the more exact Gregorian calendar, a year which closed a century, as 1500, should not be counted as a leap year unless divisible by 400, as 1600. The spring equinox had been fixed by the council of Nicea, in 325, as falling on March 21; but by 1500 March 21 was 9 days later than the spring equinox, as the years 500, 600, 700, 900, 1000, 1100, 1300, 1400, 1500 had been counted leap years. By 1582, when the Gregorian calendar was promulgated, the spring equinox was approximately 10 days out; and in that year 10 days were dropped, so that October 5 was called October 15. Countries not predominantly Roman Catholic resisted this change, England adopting the New Style calendar in 1752, Russia in 1918, and Greece in 1923. See Perpetual Calendar, page 1180.

APPENDIX VI

SCOTTISH WORDS AND PHRASES

NOTE ON PRONUNCIATION.—The pronunciation of each word is given in the Glossary; but the following general directions will be of assistance. The reader should be warned, however, that the Scottish spelling, like English spelling, is often of very little practical value as a guide to pronunciation; for the Scotchman spells many words the English way, while pronouncing them the Scottish way.

VOWELS

a is mainly sounded as in English far (ä), ask (à), or ate (ā); rarely as in cat (a).
e before r is often sounded as in English berry (ē), not as in English perfect (pûr-); as, kern (kērn).
i corresponding to English i after a consonant is usually sounded like English ĕ, as in single (sĕng'l); or like English ŭ, especially after w: as in will (wŭl). The initial element of long i corresponding to the English diphthongal sound ī is shortened or clipped, so that the diphthong is sounded like ăĭ or ä*i*.
o pronounced in English as ŏ is in many words pronounced like ō shortened as in English obey.
u is in many words pronounced like ŭ (French u).
ei is usually pronounced either ē or ī; ey is usually pronounced ī.
oi often approximates the pronunciation of ī.
oo is sometimes pronounced ů or e, sometimes o͝o.
ou is regularly pronounced o͝o; ow is pronounced either as o͝o or as ou.
ui is pronounced nearly like ü (French u).

CONSONANTS

ch, gh are pronounced like ch in German ich, ach (kh in the pronunciation key).
r is trilled or burred.
h is strongly aspirated; it is sounded in the combination wh.
w is sounded in wr; k is sounded in kn.

Austria declares war on Russia Aug. 5.
Luxembourg and Belgium invaded by the Germans Aug. 2; Liége reduced Aug. 9; Brussels invested Aug. 17; British Expeditionary Force defeated at the battle of Mons-Charleroi Aug. 21–23; Louvain destroyed Aug. 26; at the battle of the Marne Sept. 6–10, the Germans reach the supreme point of their advance and are decisively defeated by the French under Joffre and driven back (40 miles) to the Aisne River where the battle line remains practically stationary for three years.
The Germans then begin the race for the Channel ports in Belgium: occupy Antwerp Oct. 9; sanguinary battle of the Yser Oct. 16–28 and first battle of Ypres Oct. 19–Nov. 17; Germans occupy Dixmude Nov. 11 but after suffering heavy losses withdraw and establish their lines along the Yser River.
On the eastern front the Austrians invade the southern provinces of Russia but are halted by defeats at Krasnik and Lublin late in August. Russians make a counteroffensive at two points: in Galicia where they besiege and take Lemberg Sept. 3, and simultaneously further north in East Prussia where they suffer a crushing defeat at the hands of the Germans under Hindenburg at the battle of Tannenberg Aug. 26; seesaw operations continue in this territory until winter finds the Germans established on the Bzura River 30 miles west of Warsaw.
To the south, the Austrians invade Serbia and capture Belgrade Dec. 2, but the Serbians reoccupy their capital city Dec. 14.
In other fields: the Allies conquer Togoland in Africa Aug. 26; German Samoa surrenders to a New Zealand force Aug. 29; an Australian expedition captures New Guinea Sept. 11; successful invasion of German Southwest Africa by General Botha Sept. 27; Great Britain declares war on Turkey Nov. 5; British occupy Basra on the Persian Gulf Nov. 21.

1915 On the western front the Allies make several abortive attempts in Artois and Champagne to break the German deadlock: French repulsed at Soissons Jan. 14; British capture Neuve Chapelle with severe losses Mar. 10, but are hurled back at La Bassée Canal May 9; the French advance in Champagne Sept. 25; British experience a ghastly failure at Loos Sept. 27. Due chiefly to these costly blunders Sir John French is succeeded by Sir Douglas Haig in the command of the British army in France and Belgium; in the second battle of Ypres the Germans advance several miles in that salient by the use of poison gas, but they fail to penetrate the British lines Apr. 23.
The greatest activity of the year takes place on the eastern front. The Russians again invade East Prussia but are defeated by the Germans under Hindenburg in the battle of the Masurian Lakes and thrown back to the Niemen River; after a siege of six months the Russians capture the fortress of Przemysl with 120,000 Austrian prisoners Mar. 22. The tide of battle now definitely turns in favor of the Central Powers; for, breaking through the Russian lines in western Galicia by an unprecedented concentration of artillery and select troops, subsequently famous as the Mackensen phalanx, the Teutons carry out great forwarding and enveloping movements against the Russians until midautumn, capturing many great fortresses and noted cities, with more than a million prisoners and much war booty: Libau on the Baltic occupied May 8; Przemysl retaken June 3; Lemberg recaptured June 22; Lublin captured July 31; Warsaw Aug. 4; Kovno Aug. 17; Brest Litovsk Aug. 25; Grodno Sept. 3; Vilna Sept. 18. The lines are now established on a front extending from the Dvina River in the north through the Pripet Marshes just east of Pinsk, south along the Styr River in Volhynia to the junction of the borders of Bukowina and Rumania.
Following closely upon these successes, the Germans collect troops on the Serbian frontier for a massed attack on the Balkans Sept. 30; they occupy Belgrade Oct. 9; Bulgaria joins the Central Powers and invades Serbia Oct. 11; fall of Nish Nov. 16; of Prisrend Nov. 30; of Monastir Dec. 2. Serbian army completely overwhelmed and disorganized; Allies attempt to help them but succeed only in occupying Saloniki Dec. 18.
Other important events: the sinking of the Lusitania by a German submarine off the coast of Ireland May 5; Italy's declaration of war upon Austria May 21; the Italians cross the Isonzo June 2; they occupy Montfalcone and cut the railroad to Trieste June 9. The Russians meanwhile have been active against the Turks; they defeat a large Turkish force in the Caucasus and take 80,000 prisoners Jan. 5; advance on Teheran, Persia, Nov. 10; defeat the Turks in the battle of Ctesiphon Nov. 22; occupy Hamadan Dec. 17. The Allies undertake an unsuccessful campaign along the Dardanelles and land on Gallipoli Apr. 26; they capture the heights of Krithia but sustain heavy losses

A. D.

May 20; begin the evacuation of the peninsula Dec. 19.

1916 Having definitely established their lines in the east and toward the south, the Germans make a bid for supreme victory on the western front; they attack the citadel of Verdun, the key position of the French system of defense Feb. 21. After a preliminary bombardment of unparalleled intensity there is the wild rush over four miles of territory culminating in the capture of Fort Douaument Feb. 26; this is followed by a slow, grinding advance and the capture of Fort Vaux June 7. By fall the battle of the Somme has had its effect and the Germans are now on the defensive Sept. 6; they evacuate Fort Douaument Oct. 26, and relinquish Fort Vaux Nov. 1; French reoccupy Damloup Work Nov. 4, having regained all permanent defenses of Verdun.

After two years of preparation the British launch an offensive in France along the Somme River July 1–Nov.; capture Friscourt July 2; Delville Wood July 15; Pozières July 25; Guiellmont Sept. 23; Combles and Thiépval Sept. 26. By the close of the year a blunt wedge ten miles wide and six miles deep has been thrust into the German line near Péronne.

On the eastern front, the Russians under Brusiloff again take the offensive in Volhynia and Bukowina; Lutsk capitulates June 8; Czernowitz taken June 17; Radautz June 21, clearing Bukowina of the enemy; Brody taken July 28; Stanislau Aug. 10.

Rumania having entered the war on the side of the Allies begins an offensive Aug. 28; at first successful but later ending in disaster because of repeated Teuton victories under Mackensen; Rumanians take Hermannstadt Aug. 30; occupy Orsova on the Danube Sept. 8; Austrians capture Vulkan Pass Sept. 20; Constanta on the Black Sea Oct. 22; Cernavoda Oct. 25; Cralova, western military center of Rumania, falls Nov. 21; Alexandria occupied Nov. 26; Bucharest, capital of Rumania, capitulates Dec. 6.

On the Italian front the Austrians recover 300 square miles of the Trentino and capture an equal amount of Italian terrain Mar. 14–June 10; Italians launch a counteroffensive in the Isonzo valley and in the Carso June 12–Nov. 3; they capture Gorizia Aug. 9.

In other fields: the Russians capture Erzerum in Armenia Feb. 16; enter Ispahan, Persia, Mar. 19; capture Trebizond Apr. 17. Serious insurrection in Ireland Apr. 24–May 1; Sir Roger Casement accused of fomenting an Irish rebellion and executed for treason Aug. 2. Great naval battle of Jutland, Denmark, between the British and German fleets, several important ships being lost on both sides but victory conceded to the British May 31. Lord Kitchener and staff drowned when the Hampshire strikes a mine off the Orkney Islands June 5. Heavy armored cars, or tanks, first used by the British near Combles Sept. 14. Asquith ministry resigns: Lloyd George new prime minister Dec. 5.

1917 The British and French continue the Somme offensive as the weather permits: British take Grandcourt south of the Ancre River Feb. 7; Miraumont Feb. 17; British take over the entire Somme front from Saint Quentin to the sea Mar. 4; Germans begin their great retreat on a sixty-mile front to the "Hindenburg Line"; British take Bapaume Mar. 17; Germans extend their retreat on a hundred-mile front from Arras to Soissons evacuating in three days 1,300 square miles of territory Mar. 19; battle of Arras, Canadians carry Vimy Ridge Apr. 9; in Champagne French advance on a twenty-mile front winning part of the Chemin des Dames and crest of Craonne Ridge, capturing over 6,000 prisoners May 5; after heavy mine explosions the British rush Messines Ridge capturing over 5,000 prisoners southeast of Ypres June 7; battle of Flanders July 31–Nov. 6; British storm Passchendaele Ridge July 31, prolonged struggle along the Ypres-Menin Road Aug. 22–Oct. 26; Canadians enter Passchendaele Nov. 6; Canadians capture Hill 70, strategic position dominating Lens Aug. 15; French attack at Verdun and recover "Dead Man's Hill" and Hill 304, thus regaining all the high ground lost to the Germans in Feb.

A. D.

1916, Aug. 20–24; French in Champagne capture Malmaison Fort Oct. 23; Germans retreat from the Chemin des Dames to the Ailette River Nov. 1; at battle of Cambrai Nov. 20–Dec. 13, British stage a successful surprise attack under General Byng, employing tanks for the first time for cutting barbed-wire entanglements instead of the customary artillery preparations, and take Bourlon Wood dominating Cambrai; surprise counterattack by Germans, Dec. 2, force British to give up half the ground gained, Dec. 5.

On the eastern front the Russians begin a short-lived offensive in Galicia July 1; capture Halicz, strategic key to Lemberg July 11; German counteroffensive combined with extremist agitation within the ranks leads to a panicky retreat of the Russians July 20–Oct. 27; Halicz and Stanislau taken by the Germans July 23; Tarnopol July 25; Czernowitz Aug. 26; in the north, Riga on the Baltic falls Sept. 3; Moon and Dagö Islands in the Gulf of Riga occupied Oct. 18–27. In the Balkans, Mackensen reopens the Rumanian campaign Aug. 6; crosses the Susitza River on a wide front Aug. 9, eliminating Rumania as an important factor in the war

By the middle of October the Italians have occupied over 3,000 square miles of Austrian territory and are within thirty-five miles of Laibach, the gateway to Vienna; Monte Santo captured Aug. 24; Monte San Gabriele Sept. 14; the Central Powers using many divisions released from the Russian and Rumanian fronts commence a large-scale drive into Veneto Oct. 18–Dec. 26; Cividale capitulates Oct. 27; Gorizia occupied Oct. 28; British and French reënforcements arrive in Italy Nov. 4; Teutons establish a bridgehead on the Piave at Zenson Nov. 16; capture Col del Rosso and 9,000 prisoners Dec. 25.

I. BRIEF OUTLINE OF GRAMMAR

WHAT CONSTITUTES A SENTENCE

Since completeness of thought implies completeness of grammatical construction, the sentence, as the thought unit, is the basis for all discussion of those structural laws, established by usage, which constitute the grammar of our language. A sentence is a thought completely expressed in words.

That such complete expression demands a certain completeness and type of structure can readily be seen on a little consideration. Note the effect of incompleteness:

> In my garden. Will rejoice greatly. The loveliness of springtime. To welcome anew. The flowers.

Such combinations often prove little more than suggestions of our meaning and simply stimulate our curiosity. To say flowers is to suggest a single mental picture. Add as many descriptive words as we will, as multi-colored flowers, fragrant flowers, old-fashioned flowers in my garden: the result, though varying in scope and distinctness, remains a single mental picture.

If we choose from the group a word or combination of words that names something (a subject) and add to it a word or word group which tells something about the thing named (a predicate), our sense of completeness is satisfied, and the result is a sentence. It may be a simple combination of subject and predicate; as,

> Flowers grow;

or a much more complicated statement, including subject and predicate with modifiers; as,

> The old-fashioned flowers in my garden will rejoice greatly to welcome anew the loveliness of spring.

A sentence, then, is a group of words so arranged as to express a thought completely.

A sentence must be able to stand by itself and make sense. It consists in its simplest form of a subject (that about which a complete assertion is made) and a predicate (the assertion made about the subject).

THE GRAMMATICAL NATURE OF THE SENTENCE

More fully, the grammatical parts or elements of a sentence include the following:

1. Subject
2. Predicate
3. Modifiers
4. Complements
5. Connectives

Subject and Predicate

Any one of these sentence elements may consist of a single word or of a combination of words. Not all need be present in the sentence. The group of words Flowers grow is a sentence in its simplest possible form. It is made up of the two essential parts of a sentence (subject and predicate) without any dependent parts (modifiers and complements). The subject flowers names the thing talked about, and the predicate grow tells what is said of the subject. It would be easy to expand this sentence indefinitely by introducing additional details:

> The bright-colored, old-fashioned flowers in my garden (complete subject) grow quickly during the warm spring days (complete predicate).

In this expanded form it is still evident that flowers (the thing named) is the most important word of the subject. Indeed, to retain all the other words of the complete subject and to leave flowers out would result only in confusion. Flowers, then, is called the simple subject[1]; and flowers plus all the limiting words we have added is called the complete subject.

The only way we can name a thing is by a noun or another word or group of words used as a noun. A noun is accordingly a name word. A noun or its equivalent is called a substantive. The simple subject is necessarily a substantive.

Modifiers

In addition to flowers there are, included in the complete subject of the sentence examined, words or groups of words which show in more definite detail the idea conveyed by the simple subject. These are modifiers of the subject. A modifier is a word or group of words which limits[2] the meaning of the word to which it is related. A modifier may consist of a single word, or it may be in the form of a phrase or a clause.

A phrase is a group of related words, without subject and predicate, which are so combined that they perform the work of a single word.

A clause is a group of related words, having a subject and predicate; and these, when the clause is a modifier, are so combined as to perform the work of a single word. For example, in

> The old-fashioned flowers from the garden added loveliness to the room, from the garden is a phrase modifier, doing the work of a single word, in this case an adjective. In

> The old-fashioned flowers, which had grown in the garden, added loveliness to the room, which had grown in the garden is a clause modifier. In it which is the subject and had grown is the simple predicate, but the whole group is used as a single word, in this case as an adjective. Old-fashioned, in both sentences, is a word modifier.

Just as, in the expanded sentence,

> The quaint, old-fashioned flowers in my garden grow quickly during the warm spring days, flowers was obviously the most important, the really essential part of the complete subject, so also is grow obviously the essential part of the complete predicate. If we omit grow, the remaining words do not make a complete and understandable assertion. Grow is the simple predicate,[3] and grow with all the words which modify it is the complete predicate.

Just as the simple subject is always a substantive, so the simple predicate is always a verb or a verb phrase. A verb is a word which expresses action, existence, or condition, with reference to a subject. A verb phrase is a group of two or more verbs used as a single verb. Verbs which help to form verb phrases are called auxiliary verbs. For example, the italicized words in the following sentence are auxiliary verbs:

> The flowers might have grown better if the seeds had been planted earlier in the spring.

In the complete predicate grow quickly during the warm spring days, all the words except the verb grow are modifiers (or are used to form modifiers) of the simple predicate. Like the simple subject, the simple predicate may be modified by a word, a phrase, or a clause. For example:

> The flowers grow quickly (word modifier).
> The flowers grow in the garden (phrase modifier).
> The flowers grow where the sun is brightest (clause modifier).

Complements

In such a sentence as Flowers grow we have in two words all the essentials of a complete assertion. This is not always the

---

[1] The terms simple subject, simple predicate are also used of a subject or predicate consisting of a single substantive or a single verb, as in

> The buds grow; Cæsar came, in contrast to compound subject and compound predicate, as in

> The buds and blossoms grow; Cæsar came, saw, and conquered.

To avoid possible confusion, therefore, careful grammarians sometimes use the term subject substantive, instead of simple subject, to contrast with complete subject, and predicate verb, instead of simple predicate, to contrast with complete predicate.

[2] Consider the phrase, that red rose. Rose names a general concept, with nothing to specify or limit its application. Red limits the application of the word rose to one among those of a specified color; that limits it further to a particular rose which the speaker points out. Each additional modifier has a similar effect, as in case. Sometimes a word must be added to the verb and its subject to complete an assertion. The words Flowers give leave us perplexed and unsatisfied. "Give what?" is the natural query. An additional word is needed to round out the meaning of the sentence. When the word happiness is added, as in Flowers give happiness, our sense of completeness is satisfied. A word used in this way is called a complement. It does not change the meaning of the predicate verb as a modifier does, but rather rounds out and fills up its meaning.

> That tall, red, American Beauty rose in the garden.

Thus, though serving to increase the fulness of detail in the mental picture called forth, modifiers are said to limit the word which they modify.

[3] See footnote 1.

Many verbs, like grow in the sentence above, do not require a complement, and are therefore called intransitive verbs—that is, verbs which do not "carry across" their action to a receiver, or object. Others, like give as just used, need a complement to show the receiver of their action, and are called transitive verbs. There are also a few very important verbs which do not assert action at all nor tell anything that the subject does, but serve only as a link or connection between the subject and an important word in the complete predicate. They couple the subject with this word. In the sentence,

Those flowers are hollyhocks, are is merely a "joiner" or "coupler" and is called a copulative verb, or linking verb. The verb to be, with all its forms (be, am, is, are, was, were, being, been), usually performs the work of a copula and is our best example of it. Copulative verbs are commonly intransitive (as seem, appear, become), though certain forms of a number of transitive verbs (be called, be named, be chosen, etc.) have copulative uses.

Complements are of four kinds:

1. The direct object names the thing upon which the action expressed by the verb directly falls; as,

John planted the flowers.

2. Sometimes the verb is followed not only by a word which names the thing on which the action of the verb directly falls, but also by a word which names something indirectly affected by the action of the verb. In the sentence,

John gave Helen the flowers, flowers is the direct object, and Helen is the indirect object, that is, the word affected indirectly by the action of the verb.

3. Occasionally, a verb may be completed by a noun, pronoun, or adjective as a modifier which gives additional information about the direct object. In the sentences,

They call the flowers hollyhocks,
They paint the barn red, hollyhocks, red are necessary to the completeness of the predicate; for neither predicate, without the final word, would convey the sense which the speaker had in mind in using the words call, paint. Hollyhocks and red complete the predicate by referring to the direct objects. Such a complement is therefore called an objective complement (or adjunct accusative).

4. Copulative verbs are completed by words which modify or refer to the subject. The final word in each of the sentences,

Those flowers are hollyhocks,
Those flowers are old-fashioned, serves as complement to the predicate by referring to the subject; and such a complement is called a subjective complement. The former is called, more specifically, a predicate noun or predicate nominative, and the latter is commonly called a predicate adjective.

Connectives

A word, other than a verb, which has the effect of joining together or showing the relation between two or more sentence elements is called a connective. A connective may be a coördinating conjunction, a subordinating conjunction, a relative pronoun or relative adverb, or a preposition.

1. The sentence,

The trees grow, is the expression of a single thought: it has but one subject and one predicate. The sentence,

The trees grow and the flowers bloom, expresses two distinct thoughts; there are two clauses, connected by the conjunction and, so constructed that either of them could stand alone as a sentence. The two clauses are of the same rank; that is, they are coördinate. And is therefore called a coördinating conjunction. The coördinating conjunction may join any coördinate elements of a sentence; as,

You and I were there; the boys shouted and sang; the trees are tall and straight; a government of, by, and for the people; etc.

2. In the sentence,

Flowers grow if they are properly tended, there are two clauses, of which one, Flowers grow, can stand alone as an independent sentence, but the second, if they are prop- erly tended, cannot. Such a clause, which is dependent upon another for its meaning, is called a subordinate clause, and the conjunction which introduces it is called a subordinating conjunction.

3. The relative pronouns and relative adverbs are also connectives serving to introduce subordinate clauses, as in

> Flowers grow in the garden which we have planted;
> Flowers grow best where they receive some sunlight.

4. A preposition serves to show some relation between a substantive, called the object of the preposition, and some other word, as in > Flowers grow in the garden; the leaves of the maples are turning yellow.

Prepositions are classed as connectives.

Classification of the Sentence by Structure

A sentence that contains one subject and one predicate is called a simple sentence, which, however, may have a compound subject or a compound predicate, or both; as,

> The roses budded;
> The roses and violets budded and blossomed under the friendly sun.

A sentence that consists of two or more independent, or coördinate, clauses is called a compound sentence; as,

> Mother planted a garden, and soon the flowers blossomed.

A sentence that contains a dependent, or subordinate, clause is called a complex sentence; as,

> We expected the flowers to grow, since we tended them so carefully.

A compound sentence having a clause dependent upon one or more of the independent clauses is sometimes called a compound-complex sentence; as,

> July came; and the flowers, which had grown luxuriantly through the gentle spring, felt the force of the fierce midsummer sun.

Here the two principal, or independent, clauses are July came and flowers felt. The clause which had grown is a dependent clause used as an adjective modifying flowers.

THE PARTS OF SPEECH AND THEIR USES

Noun

A noun is a name word. A noun that may be used of any member of a class of things is a common noun, as table, happiness, army. The examples illustrate the three kinds of common noun, the concrete, abstract, and collective noun. For a fuller explanation of these terms, which are not essential to our present discussion, the reader is referred to the definitions in the main vocabulary of this dictionary.

A noun that names a particular one of a class is a proper noun (Haverhill, The Garden of the Gods, Mayflower). Proper nouns are capitalized. Many terms are invariably proper nouns, but common nouns are often used as proper nouns.

> Right: Then Mother planned a garden.
> Right: Then my mother planned a garden.

Nouns are used:
as subjects;
as complements;
as objects of prepositions;
in apposition; that is, to make clear another noun that denotes the same person, place, or thing (as, Henry, my brother); to show possession (as, Mother's garden was beautiful); and in direct address (as, Mother, here are flowers for you).

Pronoun

A pronoun is a word that takes the place of a noun. Thus, in the sentences,

> The dog seized the shoe and shook it;
> Will you have this or that? I will take both, the italicized words are used for nouns, with much resulting economy of effort. It stands for the shoe, you for the name of the person addressed, this for one and that for another of certain objects which must be clear from the context or the situation, I for the name of the person replying, and both for the two objects together. The noun for which a pronoun stands is called its antecedent. Pronouns are classified as follows:

A personal pronoun indicates whether the noun for which it stands is the name of the person speaking (I, plural we), the person spoken to (thou or you, plural ye or you), or the person or thing spoken of (he, she, it, plural they). Personal pronouns have different forms for the nominative, possessive, and objective cases.

A relative pronoun performs the double function of standing for its antecedent and of joining a subordinate clause to the substantive, often not its antecedent, which it modifies (who, which, what, that, as, and the compounds whoever, whichever, etc.).

An interrogative pronoun is used to introduce a question (who, which, what).

A demonstrative pronoun points out or designates a person or thing in some emphatic way (this, that, plural these, those).

An indefinite pronoun is used for a person or thing not specified (one, any, each, either, many, all, none, few, both, etc.).

Many of these words are also used as modifiers of a substantive, as in the following:

> This hat belongs to me;
> Come at any time;
> Which man do you mean?
> Come tomorrow, at which time I will explain further.

In this use they are called pronominal adjectives, interrogative adjectives, relative adjectives, etc., according to their use.

The possessives are my (mine), your (yours), his, her (hers), its, our (ours), their (theirs). They are often thought of as case forms of the personal pronouns; but they are usually employed as adjectives, and when so used are called possessive adjectives. In ordinary English, the forms in parentheses, when used as adjectives, occur only in the predicate. Thus:

> This is my dog.
> Whose dog is this? or, Whose is this dog? It is mine.

The forms in parentheses, as well as his, may also be used as pronouns, both in the predicate and elsewhere, and when so used are called possessive pronouns. Thus:

> Your dog came along, but mine did not.
> Which dog is that? It is mine.

As a rule, a possessive in the predicate answering the question Whose? is an adjective; one answering the question Which one? is a pronoun.

Verb

A verb is a word or word group that expresses action, existence, or condition with reference to a subject. Many verbs do not carry their action across to a receiver, and are therefore called intransitive verbs. Others round out their meaning by carrying action to a receiver and are called transitive verbs.

A transitive verb may make a statement in either of two ways: it may indicate by its form that the subject performed the action (as, Mother planned the garden), or that the action was performed upon the subject (as, The garden was planned by Mother). If the former method is used, the verb is said to be in the active voice; if the latter, in the passive voice. Voice, therefore, is a form of the verb which shows whether the subject acts or is acted upon.

A few verbs admit of two passive constructions in English.

> Active: The gardener gave her a rose. (Rose is direct object; her is indirect object.)
> Passive: A rose was given her by the gardener. (In this the direct object becomes the new subject. This is the only type of change of which most transitive verbs admit.)
> Passive with retained object: She was given a rose by the gardener. (In this the indirect object becomes the new subject. This type of construction is very common with the verb give and a few other verbs that take an indirect object).

Action may be predicated in several ways: the verb may express condition, may make a command, or may assert or deny something. The manner of predicating action is called mood (or mode). There are three moods.

The indicative affirms or denies; as,

> Mother planned the garden;
> She did not do the work, however.

The subjunctive expresses condition or wish; as,

> If I were you, I would plan a garden.
> O, that I were there!

The imperative expresses command or exhortation; as,

> Plan the garden!
> Let us plan a garden.

Action may be stated as taking place at any of several times. The time of the action or existence is expressed by one of the six tenses. The two simple tenses are the present and the past; the four compound tenses are the future (employing the auxiliaries shall and will), the perfect (employing have), the past perfect (employing had), and the future perfect (employing shall have and will have).

A verb used to help make some form of another verb is called an auxiliary verb.

Forms of the verb in the indicative, subjunctive, and imperative moods, which are capable of serving as predicate to a subject, are called finite. There are also various nonfinite forms, sometimes called verbals, which cannot act as predicates but which combine the fundamental meaning of the verb with the construction of a noun, adjective, or adverb.

Of the verbals, the infinitive and the gerund are used as substantives, as in

> To err is human, to forgive divine;
> Erring is human, forgiving is divine.
> I do not want to go;
> I cannot help thinking of him.

Infinitive and gerund forms of the verb may take a direct object; as,

> It is dangerous to take checks from strangers.
> He enjoyed taking a morning stroll.

The participle is used as an adjective; as, roasted peanuts; growing children. The present participle may take an object; as,

> I found him feeding nuts to the squirrels.

Participial forms, when used in the conjugation of the verb, are not felt as adjectives, but merely as inflectional forms of the verb. Thus the past participle is used in the perfect tenses, as in

> I have done the task; he had already gone, and in all tenses of the passive, as in

> The city's rubbish is dumped into the river;
> He would have come if he had been informed.

The present participle is used in all forms of the progressive, or continuous, conjugation, as in

> I was going; he had been thinking; the city was being undermined.

Adjective

An adjective is a word used to modify a noun or pronoun. An attributive (or adherent) adjective is one that stands in immediate association with the noun or pronoun it modifies (bright flowers, old-fashioned roses, beautiful garden); a predicate adjective is one that completes, and usually follows, a copulative verb (the flowers were beautiful; lovely was the day).

Adjectives refer to qualities and quantities, and therefore may have three forms to denote the varying degrees of quality and quantity. These three forms are known as degrees of comparison. The positive degree indicates the simple quality of the object without reference to any other (good, lovely, skilful, brave). The comparative degree is used when only two objects or groups are compared and indicates more of the quality (better, lovelier, more skilful, braver). The superlative degree is used when more than two objects are compared, and indicates the most of a quality (best, loveliest, most skilful, bravest).

There are two regular ways of forming the comparative and the superlative:

1. Ordinarily -er or -r is added to the positive to form the comparative, and -est or -st to the positive to form the superlative (brave, braver, bravest; lovely, lovelier, loveliest). This method is used for most adjectives of one syllable and most of those ending in y (which becomes i before the endings).

2. Some adjectives prefix more (or less) to the positive to form the comparative, and most (or least) to the positive to form the superlative (skilful, more skilful, most skilful). This method is used for many adjectives of two syllables and all adjectives of more than two syllables. For guidance, see the table on page xvii of this dictionary. Some adjectives are irregular and have different forms in the comparative and superlative (good, better, best). Some adjectives express qualities that strictly do not admit of comparison (as perfect, dead), though a comparison with some loose interpretation grows up readily about many even of these terms.

Adverb

An adverb is a word used to modify a verb, an adjective, or another adverb.

> Mother planned well;
> The garden was unusually fine;
> Mother planned extremely well.

Adverbs that admit of comparison are usually compared by the addition of more (or less), most (or least); as, skilfully, more skilfully, most skilfully. A few add -er and -est, as fast, faster, fastest; or are more or less irregular, as, well, better, best, or much, more, most. Often these are identical with corresponding adjectives in some or all of their forms.

Preposition

A preposition is a connective, typically placed before (as the name signifies) a substantive (called its object) in order to subordinate the substantive to some other word in the sentence (flowers in my garden; loveliness of spring; grow during the warm spring days; added to the room).

A preposition and its object form a prepositional phrase. This should be distinguished from a phrase used as a preposition[1] (that is, a group of several words, one or two of which may themselves be prepositions, which is used with the force of a single preposition, such as with respect to, in accordance with, in spite of).

Conjunction

A conjunction is a word used to connect. A coördinating conjunction is used to connect elements of equal rank (and, but, or). A subordinating conjunction, as we have seen on page 1399, is used to introduce a dependent clause and to show its relation to some other word in the sentence (while, because, if). Correlative conjunctions are conjunctions which are used in pairs (either . . . or; both . . . and).

Interjection

An interjection is a word thrown into (as the name signifies) a sentence in order to express feeling or emotion.

> Oh! I thought you were going to leave me.

COMMON ERRORS OF SYNTAX AND THEIR CORRECTION

Scarcely any treatise on grammar is exhaustive enough to give all the details of syntax, or the grammatical arrangement of words in connected speech. Each part of speech has certain characteristics that must be mastered in order to understand its relations to other words in the sentence. What follows is simply a practical discussion of such principles as are not always understood and are likely to cause errors in usage. It is not a digest of syntax. All grammatical terms are carefully defined and illustrated in this dictionary, and additional help and explanation can be had by reference to its pages. Experience shows that the following points need special emphasis.

Nouns

A noun has certain characteristics or properties. These are gender, number, person, and case.

1. Gender is the characteristic of nouns that denotes sex.

A noun which names a male is said to be masculine in gender; a noun which names a female is feminine; a noun which names a thing is neuter.

2. Number is the characteristic of nouns which shows whether one or more than one person or thing is represented. A noun which names one is singular; a noun which names more than one is plural.

Most nouns form their plurals by adding -s or -es to the singular (book, books; box, boxes; envelope, envelopes). Nouns ending in y preceded by a consonant change y to i, and add -es to form the plural (lady, ladies; company, companies). When y is preceded by a vowel, the plural is formed in the usual way (monkey, monkeys; essay, essays).

There are certain irregular plurals that require special attention. The following list is suggestive, but by no means exhaustive:

Singular	Plural	Singular	Plural
loaf	loaves	woman	women
self	selves	trout	trout life	lives	deer	deer
wife	wives	sheep	sheep
mouse	mice	child	children
tooth	teeth	ox	oxen

Some nouns have a plural form only (scissors, riches, politics, trousers, athletics). Sometimes such a form comes, by common usage or through some special application, to be regarded as a singular noun and is so used in a sentence; as,

> Politics is an uncertain game;
> Mathematics is a difficult subject.

When in doubt, consult your dictionary.

3. Person is a certain relation existing between a substantive and its predicate, called first person (I, we) if the substantive refers to the speaker, or to the speaker and others identified with him, second person (you) if it refers to one or more persons spoken to, or third person (he, she, it, they) if it refers to one or more persons or things spoken about.

Person seldom assumes prominence in nouns, for nearly all noun constructions fall within the third person. In pronouns, on the other hand, it is often of very great importance.

Examples of nouns in first and second person, respectively, are: "I, Matthew, take thee, Nancy, to be my wedded wife. . . ."

4. The case of a noun or pronoun is determined by its relation to other words in the sentence. The subject of a verb, or, usually (see page 1399), a predicate noun completing a form of the verb to be, is in the nominative case; the object of a verb or preposition is in the objective case, which in modern English has taken over the functions of several cases in old English, especially the dative and accusative; a noun whose form denotes possession is in the possessive (or genitive) case.

Inflection is a variation in the form of a word to indicate a variation in its use. The inflection of a noun is called its declension. So far, only one change in the form of the noun has been discussed—the change by which number is indicated. There is but one other common change, for English is not a highly inflected language. That is the change which is made to indicate the possessive (or genitive) case. In English the function of the noun is often shown by its position in the sentence; but it is always determined by the work that it does. Thus it may name the doer of the action expressed by the verb (nominative), the receiver of the action (objective), the person whom the action indirectly affects (objective or, originally, dative), etc.

The possessive case of nouns is regularly formed by adding 's to any form, singular or plural, not ending in a sibilant sound (man's, men's), and ' to a plural in s (boys'). Nouns ending in a sibilant sound add 's if monosyllabic or bearing any accent on the last syllable (Burns's, Hortense's); and also if ending in an unaccented syllable (Thomas's, Clarence's) unless the additional sibilant is disagreeable, in which case ' is added (Ulysses').

The following cases exemplify further the above rules:

boy, boy's boys, boys' lady, lady's ladies, ladies'
Charles, Charles's Charleses, Charleses' the Bartons, the Bartons'
Mr. Wells, Mr. Wells's the Wellses, the Wellses' men, men's children, children's the Misses Smith, the Misses Smith's the Messrs. Wells, the Messrs. Wells's

The possessive of some nouns occasionally gives trouble. Although some writers form the possessive singular of any noun ending in s by adding merely an apostrophe, and others allow this shortening when there is also an accumulation of other s sounds, it is probably better to add apostrophe and s ('s) regardless of accidental circumstances. Note that an apostrophe should in no case be inserted before an s belonging to the nominative form:

Defensible: Dickens' works
Defensible: Dickens' sister Preferable: Dickens's works

Wrong: Dicken's works

Joint possession (Smith and Wesson's patents) requires the use of the apostrophe with only the last name in the series; separate possession (We entertained Mary's, Alice's and Anna's mothers) requires the use of the apostrophe with each name of the series. If a possessive pronoun or possessive adjective is used paired with a noun (The book is John's and mine; John's and my books), the noun must be in the possessive case, whether joint possession or separate possession is intended.

A possessive which is awkward and slightly illogical because it attributes possession to inanimate objects should not be used.

Inadvisable: The magazine's cover; the roof's shingles; the mountain's top; the class's average; the stomach's lining.
Right: The cover of the magazine; the shingles on the roof; the top of the mountain; the average of the class; the lining of the stomach.

Although there are certain other established uses of the possessive (better, in these uses, called genitive), instances are as a rule limited to special phrases. A few will be readily recognized; as, the day's work, the law's delay, a stone's throw.

Pronouns

Perhaps the most common of grammatical stumblingblocks occurs in the use of the pronoun. Pronouns have the same properties of gender, number, person, and case that we have noted with respect to nouns, and often show these properties plainly by their form. The number of the pronoun, and its case, are the two things that cause inexperienced writers most difficulty.

Pronouns must agree with their antecedents in number.

Collective nouns as antecedents give rise to a somewhat special pronoun problem, but the solution is easy. Use a singular pronoun to refer to a collective noun when the emphasis is on the group; use a plural pronoun when the emphasis is on the individuals that make up the group.

Right: The jury is ready with its verdict.
Right: The jury were anxious to return to their homes.
Right: The committee invited the public to its sessions.
Right: The committee have earned our thanks by their untiring service.

Indefinite Pronouns

The indefinite pronouns each, every, everyone, either, neither, everybody, anybody, anyone, nobody, and no one, are singular and must be followed by singular pronouns and verbs.

Line the men up; let each (or everybody) take off his (not their) hat.

Neither Tom nor Jim is (not are) to blame.

Anybody could find his (not their) way.

I never met anyone, no matter how strong his (not their) prejudice was, who did not admit that he (not they) liked Ned.

And he whistled a spell he knew which could draw anyone's heart out of his (not their) breast.

There is nobody within half a mile who does not at once become as happy as he (not they) can be.

None is, literally, no one, and historically should therefore be singular. Usage, however, permits its use either as singular or plural, and sometimes a slight distinction in meaning or emphasis may become apparent and make one or the other, according to the circumstances, the more appropriate.

None of his friends is (presumably preferable to are) present.

None are (presumably preferable to is) finer than my friends.

A person is also an indefinite form that should be followed by a singular pronoun:

A person is judged by his appearance.

The use of the possessive with an indefinite pronoun or adjective involves a special difficulty. In speaking of a person, it is sometimes not satisfactory to say his after indefinite pronouns like no one or everybody. Everybody did their work well is, of course, wrong. His alone or her alone does not provide for both sexes; his or her is awkward. Many writers, however, consider his sufficient and feel that it covers both sexes. The difficulty can be eliminated by substituting for the indefinite pronoun a plural construction and using their; as,

All members of the group did their work well; or, if the sense and emphasis permit, by avoiding the construction; as,

The work was well done by all.

The word all, used substantively, takes plural construction when it includes a number of separate individuals, and singular construction when it means the whole (of something understood), everything.

Right: All are of one opinion.
Right: All are doing their best.
Right: "All is not gold that glitters."
Right: "All is lost save honor."
Right: All is well where all are well.

The forms of the personal, relative, and interrogative pronouns appear in the following table.

Personal Pronouns

	FIRST PERSON	SECOND PERSON	THIRD PERSON
		Singular
			Masc.	Fem.	Neut.
Nom.	I	you	he	she	it
Poss.	my, mine	you, yours	his	her, hers	its
Obj.	me	you	him	her	it
		Plural
Nom.	we	you	they
Poss.	our, ours	you, yours	their, theirs
Obj.	us	you	them

The older forms in the second person singular,

Nom. thou
Poss. thy, thine
Obj. thee

together with the nominative plural ye, are now employed only in archaic or poetic usage, as in the language of prayer, or in idiom founded upon Biblical usage, as in the speech in use among the Society of Friends, in which thee is also employed as a nominative.

Its is the possessive form of it. It's is a contraction and means it is.

Right: It's a long way to Tipperary, but its end is worth reaching.

Relative Pronouns

Singular and Plural

Nom.	who	which	that	what
Poss.	whose
Obj.	whom	which	that	what

Who is used in referring to persons, rarely to animals; which is used in referring to any kind of antecedent except a person; that to any kind of antecedent.

Who, which, or that may be used, not preceded by a comma, to introduce a clause which is explanatory or restrictive; as,

The man who toils;
The things which we most desire;
Return all those that are broken in transit.

Who or which may be used, preceded by a comma, to introduce a nonrestrictive clause, or one which conveys an additional idea; as.

We soon came upon the horse, which had stopped to graze;
This man, who appears to be a foreigner, was found near the scene.

A compound relative, or antecedent and relative in the same word (equivalent to he who, those who, that which, etc.), may be formed from who, which, or what by adding -ever (less commonly, -soever); as,

Whoever wanted to go was invited;
He got whatever he asked for.

What is also so used without -ever; as,

Give him what he wants.

Who, which, or what may be used, in a very similar construction, to introduce an indirect question; as,

I wonder who was there;
Tell me which to choose;
I could not find out what he meant.

The form whose is sometimes condemned if used otherwise than in reference to persons (of whom); but good writers frequently ignore such condemnation, and use whose as equivalent to of which in such expressions as

The bell, whose weight exceeded ten tons.

Demonstrative and indefinite pronouns have the same forms for both the nominative and the objective case. A possessive form of some of the indefinite pronouns is made by adding 's to the nominative form (anyone's, nobody's, everyone's).

The case of a pronoun is determined by its use in the sentence, and is in no way influenced by the construction of its antecedent. A pronoun agrees with its antecedent in gender, number, and person; but not necessarily in case.

The verb to be has the same case for complement as for subject.

Right: It was she. Was it he? It is I. It might have been they.

The foregoing illustrate the commonest usage; but note that the infinitive to be is often preceded by a subject in the objective case:

They took him to be his brother.

In such use it is followed by the objective case, also sometimes called the predicate objective (or predicate accusative).

Wrong: They took his brother to be he.
Right: They took his brother to be him.
Right: They believed us to be them.
Right: They declared the culprit to be him and no other.
Better: They declared that the culprit was he and no other.

When, however, the infinitive of be depends directly upon a copulative or similar verb, and has no subject expressed, the case that follows should be the nominative, and the construction is called the predicate nominative of infinitive.

Correct but awkward: The instigator seemed to be he.

With a pronoun the construction involves an inversion of emphasis and is seldom employed, but with nouns it is not uncommon.

Right: The instigator seemed to be John (nominative).

The connectives as and than are not usually followed by complete constructions. He is taller than I really means He is taller than I am tall. They gave me as much as him in its complete form is They gave me as much as they gave him. Such an omission is called an ellipsis. After as and than the nominative case is most frequently used, but only by expansion can we determine accurately the form of the pronoun to be employed.

Errors in case frequently occur when two pronouns (or a noun and a pronoun), usually objects, are joined by and. We rarely misuse pronouns thus connected when they are subjects.

Right: You and I must do the work (not you and me).
Right: She and I must do the work (not her and I).
Right: He and James must do the work (not him and James).
Right: He and she must do the work (not him and her).
Right: It's John and I (not me).
Right: He told James and her to work (not she).
Right: They asked her and me the question (not she and I).
Right: He asked you and me.

For the word governed by a preposition the objective case is always used.

Right: A few of us boys did the work (not a few of we).
Right: That will hardly be believed by John and me (not I).
Right: This is a secret between you and me (never between you and I).

The correct form can be determined when there is doubt by omitting all the words that intervene between the preposition and the pronoun which follows it. The error in saying,

They gave the books to Mary and I is evident when we write

They gave the books to I.

Special caution is needed with the use of the preposition but. When but means except and is not followed by the conjunction that, it is a preposition and must be followed by the objective case.

Wrong: Nobody came but he.
Right: Nobody came but him.

A pronoun which immediately precedes an infinitive is usually the subject of the infinitive and hence in the objective case. See page 1406.

Wrong: Let you and I go.
Right: Let you and me go.

Sometimes writers attempt to conceal ignorance as to which is the correct usage by substituting a reflexive pronoun for the simple personal form. The use of and myself in conjunction with nouns or the simple forms of personal pronouns is objectionable on grounds of emphasis and harmony. Myself may be used where there is a true reflexive construction or, for emphasis, with the pronoun (I or me) to which it refers.

Objectionable: He gave the book to James and myself.
Objectionable: This is between you and myself.
Objectionable: Mary and myself were there.
Right: He gave the book to James and me.
Right: This is between you and me.
Right: Mary and I were there.
Right: I will take it upon myself.
Right: I myself will be there.

That the case of pronouns is determined by their use in the sentence is as true of the relative pronoun who (and its forms whose, whom, whoever, whomever, whomsoever) as it is of all the other pronominal forms. When in doubt, determine whether the relative pronoun is the subject or the object. Care is particularly necessary in the following cases:

1. When the relative pronoun occurs in an indirect question.

Right: They asked who did the work.

Here the pronoun is clearly the subject of the verb in the dependent clause. The whole clause is used as object of asked. Therefore who is correct.

Right: They asked whom I saw.

The verb in the dependent clause here has I as subject and the relative pronoun as object; hence whom is correct.

Right: Whom shall you invite?
Right: The guests shall be whomever you designate.

Although the main verb is a copula, the predicate nominative is the whole clause whom you designate. Whomever takes its form as object of the verb designate.

2. When expressions like he says, they thought, I supposed, intervene between the relative pronoun and the rest of the clause.

Right: Who do you think came to call?

Omit the expression do you think and the relation between who and the rest of the sentence is obvious. Who is clearly the subject of came, and the whole clause who came to call is the object of the verb think.

Right: The child, who we thought was quietly sleeping, gave a sudden cry.

Again the omission of the parenthetical expression we thought shows plainly the relation between who and its predicate was sleeping.

Or, we might have said:

Right: The child, whom we thought to be quietly sleeping, gave a sudden cry.

This is in accordance with the principle concerning construction with the infinitive, which we have treated above.

3. When verbs or prepositions, immediately preceding the relative pronoun, tend to attract it into the wrong case.

Right: Choose whoever can best do the work.

The object of choose is not whoever but the whole clause whoever can best do the work. Whoever is subject of can do.

But

Right: Choose whomever the situation demands.

Again the whole clause is the object of choose; in the clause situation is the subject of demands, and whomever is the object of demands.

Similarly,

Right: Give the job to whoever can best do the work.
Right: Give the job to whomever you trust best.

For like reasons,

Right: They may be whom you designate.

Although the main verb is a copula, the predicate nominative is the whole clause whom you designate. Whom takes its form as object of the verb designate.

In the sentences,

The guests shall be whoever you please;
Give the job to whoever you like, the clauses whoever you please, whoever you like preserve an older special construction with please and like, which formerly meant be pleasing (to). In this older construction, you was a dative, and whoever the subject of please or like. These clauses are thus both equivalent to whoever is pleasing to you, and whoever, as the subject of the verb in its own clause, is historically the correct form. Through misunderstanding of this special construction, and from the analogy of clauses like whomever you prefer, whomever you designate, whomever you choose, the form whomever is sometimes used with please and like. A strict analysis of this usage, however, shows that it results in a change of sense. Whomever you please would make its sentence mean

> The guests shall be any person(s) to whom you are pleasing.

Whomever you like would make its sentence mean

> Give the job to any person(s) for whom you have a liking.

Verbs

More than one half of the errors in oral speech occur in the use of the verb. The principal parts of the verb are the present tense, the past tense, and the past participle. By means of these parts and the addition of the auxiliaries shall, will, have (has, had), and be (is, am, are, was, were, been) are made all forms of the verb except the so-called emphatic forms (made with the inflected forms of do, did, as, I do go, I did go). Recent investigation has shown that an ignorance of these three principal parts of the verb is responsible for twenty-four per cent of all the grammatical errors we make. Nearly ninety per cent of all verb errors grow out of the misuse of only fourteen verbs. It is exceedingly important, therefore, that the following forms be memorized and used with unfailing correctness.

Present	Past	Past Participle
do	did	done
see	saw	seen
write	wrote	written sit	sat	sat
lie	lay	lain
come	came	come
go	went	gone
ring	rang	rung
am (are, is; infinitive, to be)	was (were)	been run	ran	run
give	gave	given take	took	taken
begin	began	begun
break	broke	broken

The principal parts of any irregular verb can easily be found by looking up the infinitive form in the dictionary.

The past tense always stands alone and is used without an auxiliary: I went home; I came back; I saw Alice there; I gave her your message. The past participle is used with an auxiliary; as, I have gone home; I have come back; etc. Such forms as I have saw, I have wrote, I had went, and I done it, I seen him, he come back an hour ago, result from a confusion of the past tense with the past participle, and should be carefully avoided.

The future tense is formed by combining shall or will with the present tense form (I shall go home; they will come back; we shall see Alice); the perfect, past perfect, and future perfect tenses are formed by have, had, or shall (or will) have, or their inflectional forms combined with the past participle (I have gone home; we have seen Alice; she will have gone home); and the passive forms of the verb by using some form of the verb be with the past participle (The book was stolen; Alice was seen today).

The auxiliaries shall and will are used to form future tenses. The following table shows in condensed form the general distinction in their use:

I: The force of a given auxiliary

	FIRST PERSON	SECOND PERSON	THIRD PERSON
Shall	futurity	determination promise command	determination promise threat
Will	determination promise	futurity	futurity

II: The auxiliary required for a given meaning

FUTURITY		DETERMINATION, COMMAND, THREAT, OR PROMISE
Singular	Plural	Singular	Plural
I shall	we shall	I will	we will you will	you will	you shall	you shall

I shall go, you will go, they will go indicate simple expectation on the part of the speaker. I will go, we will go are promises or expressions of determination. They indicate intention (I am planning to go; I give you my word for it; we have made up our minds about it). You shall go, he shall go, they shall go denote determination exercised by the speaker, obligation imposed by him, or compulsion exercised by him (I will see to it that you go, etc.).

In questions, use shall in the first person; in the second and third persons use the auxiliary expected in the answer: Shall we go to the circus? (We shall go to the circus). Will you get the tickets? (I will get the tickets).

In general, the auxiliaries should and would (derivatives of shall and will) are used in the same way. Should is used in the first person, and would in the second and third. Note the following usage in accordance with the general rule:

Wrong: I would be glad to go.
Right: I should be glad to go.

Any element of promise that may be present is directed toward the idea of going and not toward that of being glad, and is transmitted in the meaning of the verb be glad itself. Prefer I should to I would for similar usages. We may, however, correctly use either of the forms

I would gladly go, or I should gladly go, according to the shade of our meaning. Here the auxiliary affects go instead of be glad.

Two special uses of should and would require discussion. Should is used in the second and third persons to denote duty or obligation:

As a writer, you should watch carefully the structure of your sentence;
To succeed as a writer, he should improve his sentence structure.

Would is used to express a wish or to indicate a habit or custom:

Would I were a better writer;
He would work for hours trying to improve his sentence structure.

A single form of the verb to be cannot logically fulfill two functions. It cannot be the principal verb in one part of the sentence and an auxiliary in another part.

Wrong: They are returning tomorrow and as happy as can be.

The verb must be repeated:

Right: They are returning tomorrow and are as happy as can be.

A verb agrees with its subject in number and person. There are two violations of this rule, occurring when some other noun or nouns intervene between the verb and its subject, which are quite common but which should be carefully avoided. They may be outlined as follows:

(1) Singular subject + plural noun, wrongly construed with a plural verb.

(2) Plural subject + singular noun, wrongly construed with a singular verb.

Wrong: Not one in a thousand readers take the matter seriously.
Right: Not one in a thousand readers takes the matter seriously.

One is the subject; therefore the verb must be singular.

Wrong: The commander of the army, with all his advisers, were in favor of the attack.
Right: The commander of the army, with all his advisers, was in favor of the attack.
Wrong: The prices of food rises in response to demand.
Right: The prices of food rise in response to demand.

Prices, not food, is the subject, and therefore the verb should be plural.

When the subject follows the predicate, special caution must be exercised to see that verb and subject agree.

Wrong: There is a great many things to be said in his favor.
Right: There are a great many things to be said in his favor.
Wrong: What do a set of those books cost?
Right: What does a set of those books cost?

Do not use don't in the third person singular of the indicative mood, the mood used to make an ordinary assertion. It is a contraction of do not; and no one would think of writing or saying:

He do not please our customers.

He, she, and it must be followed by does; therefore, if a contraction is used, doesn't is the only form permissible. Do not is correct in the third person singular of the subjunctive, but this construction is not common.

Two or more nouns joined by and take a plural verb:

Ontario is a sportsman's paradise, for both hunting and fishing are good there.

When members of a compound subject are joined by or, nor, or but, the verb is singular or plural according as the members are singular or plural:

Right: Neither the boy nor the girl was right.
Right: Either Mary or John is wrong.

When the members of the subject differ in number, the verb usually agrees with the subject which is nearer:

Right: Neither the boys nor their father is responsible.

In some such cases, however, neither form should be used; the sentence should be recast.

Inadvisable: Neither the foreman nor his men were willing to state their demands.
Inadvisable: Neither the foreman nor his men was willing to state his demands.
Preferable: The foreman was not willing to state his demands, nor would his men state theirs.

When the members of the subject differ in person, and require different forms of the verb, there is no rule to follow that is satisfactory. Depending upon the emphasis in the sentence, the verb may agree with either subject:

Right: Either he or I am right; Right: Either he or I is right;

or, if the subjects are in the first and second persons, the verb may sometimes properly be in the third person:

Right: Neither you nor I is the appropriate person to send.

A prime requisite of good style is that the reader should meet with nothing that will distract his attention from the thought. In writing, therefore, the best rule in all these cases is to recast the sentence into such form that it cannot give offense to anyone. In speaking, it is generally safe to use whichever form appears to fit in best with the thought to be expressed, so long as clear errors are avoided such as that in Neither the boy nor the girl were right.

Do not needlessly make inconsistent changes in voice or tense.

Poor: After I arrived at the library, the book was quickly procured by me.
Better: After I arrived at the library, I procured the book quickly.
Wrong: Freedom means that a man may conduct his affairs as he pleases so long as he did not injure anyone else.
Right: Freedom means that a man may conduct his affairs as he pleases so long as he does not injure anyone else.

Nice distinctions should be made in the use of several verbs. Chief among these are lie, lay, sit, set, rise, raise, leave, let. These troublesome verbs are defined clearly in the main vocabulary of this dictionary. See also Common Errors, page 1429.

Modifiers

In careless speech adjectives are often carelessly used where adverbs are needed. But there is a difference, and good usage demands that it be observed. An adjective may complete a verb, but it never modifies a verb, adjective, or adverb.

Wrong: He finished the work good.
Wrong: Am I going? Sure.
Right: He finished the work well.
Right: Am I going? Surely.

The situation is made somewhat more complicated by the circumstance that although adverbs expressing manner usually end in -ly, there are, besides obviously irregular forms (as well), a few adverbs that, for reasons entirely well founded in the history of the language, do not differ in form from the adjectives. Moreover certain words ending in -ly are primarily adjectives and only incidentally, if at all, adverbs (as fatherly, godly, goodly, likely, lonely, lovely, etc.). A few adjectives have two adverbs, one identical in form with the adjective, and one in -ly. Sometimes these may be used interchangeably; sometimes they have developed differences, occasionally marked (as hard, hardly), but usually slight (as slow, slowly; last, lastly; high, highly). Care in their use will bring at first correctness and later a nice discrimination.

Right: He struck low.
Right: Come quick; or, Come quickly.
Right: Dive deep; or, Dive deeply; but, Meditate deeply.
Preferable: Climb high; Regard highly.
Preferable: This building is as nearly fireproof as we can make it.
Quaint: Tell me true.
Modern: Tell me truly.

Most errors with respect to adverbs, however, arise not out of such considerations but out of sheer neglect of recognized forms in -ly.

To complete verbs like look, sound, taste, smell, feel, and others which relate to the senses, an adjective is ordinarily used rather than an adverb. Use an adverb only when it is very clear that the verb (and not the subject) is modified.

Right: The flowers look nice (not nicely).
Right: That story doesn't sound good (not well).
Right: The soup tasted good (not well).
Right: The flowers smell bad (not badly).
Right: I am feeling rather bad (not badly).

Avoid using an adverb for an adjective as complement of the direct object of a verb.

Right: Cut the slices thin (not thinly).
Right: Plane the board smooth (not smoothly).
Right: Wash the clothes clean (not cleanly).

Well is not only an adverb but on occasion an adjective and may be so used after feel. Say, I am feeling rather well, if your meaning is "I am in good health"; for in good health is a recognized adjectival meaning of well. Say, I am feeling rather good, if you mean "I am feeling in good spirits," or if you have any other recognized adjectival meaning of good to express.

Place modifiers so that their relation to the word which they modify will be clearly indicated. Special caution is necessary in the use of only. Observe the changes in meaning produced by its introduction in the sentence, I need a few dollars:

I need only a few dollars.
I need a few dollars only.
I only need a few dollars.
Only I need a few dollars.

Almost, alone, ever, nevertheless are also troublesome.

Sometimes a modifier is so placed that it is not clear which of two constructions it modifies.

Wrong: He said when he got a chance he would go.
Right: He said he would go when he got a chance; or, When he got a chance to speak, he said he would go.
Wrong: Some of the boys I knew would enjoy coasting.
Right: I knew some boys who would enjoy coasting; or, Some of the boys would enjoy coasting, I knew.
Wrong: He turned away slowly admitting that he was in the wrong.
Right: He turned away, admitting slowly that he was in the wrong; or, He slowly turned away, admitting that he was in the wrong.

In the second and third instances above, proper punctuation might suffice to make the meaning clear; but, as we have indicated, the more radical correction is still a very simple one.

Of the various nonfinite forms of the verb, two, the participle and the gerund, call for especial attention.

A participle is a form of the verb which is used as an adjective. See page 1402. Its relation to the noun it modifies should always be carefully shown.

Wrong: Having eaten our breakfast, the waiter presented his check.
Right: Having eaten our breakfast, we were given our check by the waiter.
Right (expanded to a clause): As soon as we had eaten our breakfast, the waiter presented his check.

A gerund is a part of the verb identical in form with the present or the perfect participle but partaking of the nature not of an adjective but of a noun. (See page 1404). Although it is, in some constructions, less dependent than the participle, in others it equally demands that the reference to the doer of the action which it names be made plain. Keep the reference clear.

Wrong: After eating our breakfast, the waiter presented his check.
Right: After eating our breakfast, we were given our check by the waiter.

Or the gerund may be expanded to a clause, as was suggested in connection with the participle above.

When words are considered merely as written or spoken symbols and without reference to the sense which they customarily express, several peculiarities of usage develop. Under such conditions even a plural form takes singular construction:

Right: In "The flowers grow," flowers is the simple subject.

Words ordinarily representing various parts of speech are used like nouns:

Right: In "The pansy grows," grows is the verb.

Forms ordinarily pronouns take the construction called for in the sentence and do not vary in form:

Right: In "He gives her the book," her is indirect object; the verb gives has he as subject.

The plural of figures and letters and of words or expressions considered simply as written or spoken forms is regularly made by adding apostrophe and s ('s).

Right: Dot your i's and cross your t's;
Right: Be careful about your the's;
Right: Make us sure of your 2's and 3's.

It is best to write such forms in italics, or, in handwriting, to draw a line under them, not merely, as in this article, for display, but in your own occasional use of them.

SENTENCE CONSTRUCTION

In building sentences complete predication should be maintained. Every sentence has at least one independent, finite verb expressed or unmistakably implied in the context. Do not write a part of a sentence as if it were an entire sentence. The incompleteness of the following italicized forms is obvious:

Wrong: You asked in October for an extension of credit. Which we gladly granted.

Right: You asked in October for an extension of credit, which we gladly granted.

Given more emphasis: You asked in October for an extension of credit. We gladly granted it.

Wrong: The garments having been worn. It is contrary to our policy to accept them for credit.

Right: The garments having been worn, it is contrary to our policy to accept them for credit.

Wrong: There are two courses open to us. One to accept the goods and lose money, and the other to lose an old customer.

Right: There are two courses open to us. One is to accept the goods and lose money, and the other is to lose an old customer; or, There are two courses open to us: one to accept the goods and lose money, the other to lose an old customer.

To write two independent thoughts in one sentence without definitely designating them as complete by means of proper punctuation is almost as radical a misconception of what constitutes a sentence.

Wrong: You asked in October for an extension of credit, we gladly granted it.

Right: You asked in October for an extension of credit. We gladly granted it; or, You asked in October for an extension of credit; we gladly granted it; or, You asked in October for an extension of credit, and we gladly granted it.

Except for a few authorized usages such as that involving the answer to a question, completeness of thought cannot be achieved if either the subject or the verb is unexpressed. In ordinary speaking and writing, condensed or telegraphic forms which leave the thought suspended and undeveloped should be avoided; in routine business letters they give less offense, but should be used with caution.

Condensed: Yours at hand.

Right: Your order has been received.

Condensed: Am sorry rules prevent exchange of goods worn.

Right: We are sorry that our rules prevent the exchange of goods which have been worn.

II. PUNCTUATION

Marks of punctuation are used fundamentally to make meaning plain, and understanding probable, quick, and easy. There are certain types of relation, chiefly within the sentence, that have come to have their nature indicated in a standardized way by the use of conventional marks. Correct punctuation aids the reader to determine, almost at a glance, what words go together and, in some measure, how they do so. Although usage is not absolutely uniform throughout, to neglect or to minimize punctuation would be to deprive writer and reader alike of a valuable aid to the transmission of thought.

The following section shows the typical functions of the various marks. In some instances, such as that of the comma, it is hardly to be recommended that they be learned in detail; but proper reflection upon them and a perception of their underlying nature, assisted by due noting of the examples, will make the use of punctuation easier for the beginner, and should decrease the loss of meaning between the intent of the writer and the understanding of the reader.

The Period, or Full Stop [.]

In dictation and telegraph practice the period is usually called stop: in reading decimals and in proof reading it is usually called point.

The period is used:

1. At the end of every sentence that is not interrogative or exclamatory in form or spirit (except when omitted; see note below, following 6); also, at the end of every elliptical expression doing duty for such a sentence.

Examples: The day is dark.
Return soon.
Let us go.
Yes.
Now as to my opponent's second objection.

It is usual to omit the concluding period that might logically be expected at the end of a declarative or imperative sentence that closes with a quoted interrogative or exclamatory element, inasmuch as such a period would follow an interrogation point or an exclamation point.

Examples: The cry was "Where?" Not: The cry was "Where?".
He shouted, "How brave I am!" Not: He shouted, "How brave I am!".

2. After most abbreviations.

Examples: Mr. Mrs. Dr.
U. S. A. a. m. lb.

Chemical symbols are not considered as abbreviations, and do not take the period. Thus H stands for hydrogen, Hg (Lat. hydrargyrum) for mercury, etc. Similarly when a word is contracted by using a symbol for all but a few final letters, the period is not used, as in 4th for fourth, 4to for quarto, 8vo for octavo, 12mo for duodecimo, etc.

Contractions do not as a rule take the period.

Examples: Sec. but Sec'y
Att. or Atty. but sometimes Att'y (without period).

In the style of a few printing houses the period is dispensed with in the case of Mr., Mrs., Dr., MS., and some other common abbreviations. French usage omits the period in the case of Mme. and Mlle.

3. Before a decimal fraction; and sometimes to separate other fractional units from units of a larger order, as minutes from hours (see also Colon, 6).

Examples: 3.7 (three and seven tenths: often read three point seven); .29 (twenty-nine one hundredths = twenty-nine per cent = 29%); 5.14 p. m. (fourteen minutes past five in the afternoon: also written 5:14 p. m. (see Colon, 6); 5^{14} p. m.; $5\frac{14}{}$.

Do not use the percentage sign in addition to the decimal point. Note that .01% is not correct for one per cent, but means .0001.

4. To separate dollars and cents, numerically expressed; or to precede cents given alone (note example).

Examples: $7.69; $.49 (some authorities prefer $0.49); $.09.

Note that .09¢ is not correct for nine cents, but means nine hundredths of a cent. Avoid such duplications as $.09¢.

5. Often, after letters and figures designating divisions or subdivisions of written matter. When the letters or figures are inclosed in parentheses or followed by the closing parenthesis, there is usually no period. Cf. Parentheses, 2, comment.

Examples: I. United States.
1. North Carolina.
(1) Moore County.
a) Southern Pines.

6. Sometimes, after Roman numerals. Upon this point usage is divided; modern usage tends to omit the period.

Examples: Charles II. (older usage);
Charles II (modern usage).

Periods are usually omitted at the ends of lines and at the end of the last sentence in monumental or architectural inscriptions, formal social communications, engraved work, title pages of books, covers of books and magazines, etc.

If the sentence ends with an abbreviation, only one period is used. In general this situation is to be avoided, but some natural instances occur.

Example: He arrived at 7.15 p. m.

If an abbreviation comes at the end of a parenthetical expression closing a sentence of which it is only a part, the period marking the abbreviation comes inside the closing parenthesis, and there is also a sentence period placed outside.

Example: He was in New York as soon as could be expected (he could not, in fact, leave Boston until 4 p. m.).

The Comma [,]

The comma is used to mark the slightest pause for which any mark is assigned. Its uses are very numerous and often so closely related that they may overlap. The commonest uses are as follows:

1. To set off words, phrases, or clauses, slightly parenthetical in nature but not constituting sufficiently definite interruptions to call for parentheses or dashes.

Examples: This, to put it mildly, is disquieting.
All the men, and their baggage, were on the front platform.

In the second example the punctuation is specially used to indicate a parenthetical structure. In ordinary construction no commas would be used.

2. To set off nonrestrictive, or descriptive, clauses or phrases.

Right: The District of Columbia, which includes the city of Washington, is specially administered.

Note that restrictive clauses or phrases are not set off; but cf. 3, below.

Right: He who is right need fear naught.

3. Sometimes, after a series of terms followed by a restrictive clause that applies to all, to show that the restrictive clause applies equally to the various antecedents and is not connected merely with the last (note the last comma in the following example):

Example: Dashes, as we have seen, may indicate omission, but usually of figures, letters, words, or short expressions, that are either understood or of little significance.

4. To set off words, phrases, or clauses in apposition.

Example: New York, the largest city in the country, is situated on the Atlantic coast.

But note that appositives that have practically merged with their antecedents to form a single substantive unit, and other appositives very closely connected in thought and function with their antecedents, are commonly written without the comma.

Examples: Peter the Hermit
The word meticulous

5. To set off absolute constructions.

Example: The day being warm, we made only leisurely progress.

6. To separate a dependent from an independent clause.

Example: After he had arrived at the village, he decided to stay for the night.

Note, however, that if the clause is short or the connection close, the comma may be omitted.

Examples: After he came he stayed.
He planned to do it when he returned. (In this form the when clause modifies to do).

7. To separate main independent clauses in a compound sentence when they are connected by a conjunction and are too closely related for a semicolon.

Examples: I should very much like to stay, but I am expected at home.
The shot rang out, and the runners were off.

8. Before etc., and so forth, and the like, and similar expressions; also after them unless other punctuation is required.

Example: Nails, tacks, etc., can be bought at the store.

9. To separate place names that explain each other; also, the day of the week from the day of the month, and the day of the month from the year.

Examples: Springfield, Clark County, Ohio
Monday, July 4, 1927

There is an observable tendency to omit the comma when the month name, without a numeral, immediately precedes the year. This usage prevails in library, magazine, and reference-book practice, but for general purposes the use of the comma is on the whole still to be recommended.

Allowable: August 1914.

We no longer use commas to separate B. C., A. D., or similar expressions from year numerals that they precede or follow.

Examples: 49 B. C.; A. D. 1076; A. U. C. 704.

Note that a comma precedes, and unless other punctuation is required, follows, a place name or date which gives additional or more definite information.

Examples: Springfield, Illinois, has many traditions of Lincoln.
October 12, 1492, is the date of the great discovery by Columbus.

10. To separate nouns from addresses.

Examples: John Doe, 7 Oak Street.
Meet me at the office, 12 Park Avenue.

Note that on an envelope or an interior address of a letter, this comma and other commas to be expected at the end of a line, together with the final period, may be omitted or retained, according to the style.

Note that with nonrestrictive, explanatory, or parenthetical of phrases, giving an address, the comma is used; with of phrases that are restrictive or have merged in thought with the noun, no comma is used.

Examples: John Doe, of 7 Oak Street, will be there.
John of Gaunt was the father of Henry IV.

11. Often, to set off words, phrases, or clauses that are placed ahead of the subject and predicate.

Example: At the extreme end of the wharf, Charles discovered a rusty anchor.

12. To set off words, phrases, or clauses in parallel construction.

Examples: "Unwept, unhonored, uninterred he lies."
An astounding, outrageous act.

In a series of three or more expressions, with a conjunction between the last two, the comma before the conjunction, though formerly often omitted, is preferably retained.

Examples: "Unwept, unhonored, and unsung."
Men, women, and children were affected.

Note that when two adjectives (or words used as adjectives) modify the same noun, but the first is thought of as applying not to the noun alone but to the noun as limited by the second, no comma is used.

Examples: gray college walls; good whipped cream; a bright spring day.

13. To separate words that are repeated.

Examples: "From the bells, bells, bells, bells, bells, bells, bells."
"The thoughts of youth are long, long thoughts."

14. To separate groups of words, most commonly pairs.

Example: Rising and falling, twisting and turning, the waters flowed.

15. To introduce a short quotation; also, to set off words that interrupt a quotation and explain its utterance, and usually at the end of a short quotation that does not conclude the sentence.

Examples: He said, "Tomorrow we shall see."
"Brevity," runs the proverb, "is the soul of wit."
"Come tonight," called James as we left.

16. To set off a noun, or other substantive, of address.

Examples: "Maid of Athens, ere we part, Give, oh, give me back my heart!"
"Lead, kindly Light, amidst the encircling gloom."
"Hail to thee, blithe spirit!"

17. Often, after the salutation of a letter in which the tone is intimate:

Example: Dear John,
Your letter of yesterday, etc.;

and after the complimentary close of a letter:

Example: Yours truly,

18. Often, to set off words, phrases, and clauses, expressing the manner in which the sentence follows the thought that has preceded; as, first, finally, consequently, nevertheless, however, therefore. in a word, I admit.

19. Usually, after yes and no; often to set off now, well, and why in their mild interjectional senses.

Examples: Yes, I will come.
Well, I should say in five days.

20. After an interjection that is only slightly exclamatory; also, before such an interjection occurring in the midst of a clause.

Example: But she, alas, will not be there.

21. Often, to express the omission of a word understood from the context, especially in a clause preceded by a semicolon.

Example: "Histories make men wise; poets, witty; the mathematics, subtle; natural philosophy, deep."

Often, however, when there is no semicolon preceding, the omission is not marked.

Example: "Reading maketh a full man, conference a ready man, and writing an exact man."

Comparing the two examples above, taken from the same source, note the difference in movement.

22. Sometimes, to set off and make clear what might otherwise be confusing.

Examples: "Whatever is, is right."
What he has, has never been determined.
In the winter preceding this, was a severe blizzard in April.

23. To mark off groups of three digits, counting from right to left, in Arabic numerals of more than four digits; also, often in those of four digits, except in dates and in page or street numbers.

Examples: 73,492; 928,374,560;
The year 1776; The word is on page 1074.

Do not separate a verb from an object or similar complement immediately following by a comma. Note, however, that a direct quotation is so set off; and that if the sentence structure is broken, as in tabulation or the like, a colon is often used.

Wrong: We have, apple pie, peach pie, mince pie, and custard pie (first comma).

Wrong: I saw, that he was not present.

Right: John turned and said, "Go back."

Right: Three characteristics of Gothic architecture are: 1, the pointed arch; 2, the long vertical lines; 3, the flying buttress.

Note that in parliamentary usage Resolved may be followed by a comma or a colon.

Examples: Therefore be it Resolved, that we, the citizens of the Fifth Precinct, in mass meeting assembled, do hereby . . .

Resolved: that capital punishment ought to be abolished.

The Semicolon [;]

The semicolon is much like an expanded comma. Despite its name, its function in modern usage does not closely resemble that of a colon. The semicolon is used:

1. In a compound sentence, to separate clauses which are in parallel independent construction, and which are not intimately connected.
   (a) Sometimes the transition is unmarked except by the semicolon. The pause itself may be equivalent to a but or a therefore, or the like (cf. Colon, 7). If the nature of the transition is clear, the sentence will be more emphatic without the word of transition than with it.

   Examples:
   He did not take an ax; he took a hatchet.
   So long as the tigress remained crouching, I saw no reason for moving; I stood stock-still.

   (b) Sometimes the transition is marked by a conjunctive adverb, such as thus, therefore, nevertheless, however.

   Example: He did not take an ax; therefore I felt confident that he did not intend to fell any trees.

   (c) Often when a coördinating conjunction (and, but, or, nor, for) is used, a comma will suffice, instead of a semicolon; but when the natural pause is greater or calls for special emphasis, a semicolon may be used.

   Example: So long as the tigress remained crouching, I saw no reason for moving; but I was in terror lest the hapless beast at the spring should cease to engage her attention.
2. To mark a larger division between sentence elements in one or more of which commas occur.

   Example: And thereupon, in order the better to accomplish his purpose, he reached for the quarterstaff; but I was prepared, and placed my foot upon it.
3. Commonly, to separate divisions after an enumeration introduced by a colon, particularly if any of the divisions include explanatory matter.

   Example: Hitherto, fabrics have been woven chiefly of four materials: wool, obtained chiefly from the sheep; silk, the product of the silkworm; linen, derived from flax; and cotton, yielded by the cotton plant.
4. Often, to separate a number of subordinate clauses occurring successively as dependents upon a final main clause.

   Example: If I had not been so sure of myself upon the eventful morning; if I had not met my mischievous informant at the most inopportune moment; if I had not, to my embarrassment and chagrin, already given up two attempts —I should hardly have set out when I did.

   Usage as to the punctuation before the final clause differs. Some would prefer a comma and dash, and some a semicolon and dash.
5. To separate the parts of a reference to text and line, chapter and verse, etc.

   Example: For use of plummet in Shakespeare's The Tempest, see Act III, Scene iii, line 101 (also written III: 3:101; III:3^{101}; 3:3^{101}; etc.).

The Colon [:]

The colon, in all of its commoner sentence constructions, is the mark of formal expectancy. The colon is used:

1. To introduce a quotation consisting of a sentence of substantial length or of more than one sentence. Short quotations are introduced with a comma; some extend this use to quotations consisting of several short sentences.

   Example: After he had reached the hall and found the chairman, he said: "I am sorry that my colleagues have not arrived as yet; but if you can hold the meeting for a few minutes longer, I am sure that they will put in an appearance."
2. To introduce an enumeration, or a list of particulars. For example see Semicolon, 3.

In case an expression such as namely, viz., as follows, specifically, occurs before the enumeration, some authorities recommend the semicolon; but the colon is the better punctuation.

3. To introduce a clause summarizing or explaining a portion of a clause immediately preceding.

Example: My reason for opposing him is this: I feel that he is not sufficiently tactful.

4. After the salutation in letters, and similar communications in which intimacy is not stressed.

Examples:
Dear Sir:
My dear Mr. Jones:
Gentlemen:
To the Editor:
To Whom it may Concern:

The comma and dash was formerly so used, but this use is disappearing.

After salutations between intimates the less formal comma may be used.

The semicolon should not be used after a salutation.

5. Before a clause in a compound sentence which summarizes the purport of two or more preceding clauses separated by semicolons, or which develops a conclusion out of them.

Example: The wires in the country districts are down; the roads are blocked; the trains are not running on schedule: there is no sense in our trying to reach Aunt Ellen tonight.

This use, because of the difficulty in stating and apprehending it, is less frequently taught and less common than the others; but it is well established in usage, and is frequently characteristic of certain masters of style.

6. Sometimes, to separate a numeral from another numeral of lower rank, or a place name from a division or some particular to be recorded under the name.

Examples:
At 9:40 our train leaves. (Also, more commonly, 9.40.)
Ecclesiastes 12: 12.
Philadelphia: The John C. Winston Company.

7. In careful writing, to indicate a close connection of sense between two clauses when no connective word is used. In popular use the semicolon or the dash is usually employed in such cases.

Examples:
I have not seen him all summer: he has been in Europe.
The dealers are overstocked with second-hand cars: times have been getting harder.
He always said he would object to the type of reorganization that was proposed, but when the time came he did not enter any protest: there was no occasion to do so.

The Dash [—]

The dash is used:

1. To mark interruption in thought, an abrupt change in point of view or sentence structure, or hesitation or incompleteness in speech.

Example:
"As I was going along here yesterday, I saw—hello, what do you want of me now?"
"Well, Judge, I was just thinking that if you happened to have—if you might be so good as to—to let me have—well, maybe you would—"
"Will a dollar do?"
"Yes, sir; thank you very much, sir."

2. Sometimes to indicate an omission of letters, figures, or words.

Example: In the year 18—, in the little frontier town of D—, a group of military officers met at the village tavern.

See also Marking Omissions.

3. To strengthen another mark of punctuation, as a comma, colon, or period. The comma and dash particularly have been used together with the function of the shorter and more formal colon. The present tendency, however, is against the use of marks in combination, except for uses involving parentheses, brackets, and quotation marks.

Possible: I went back for my luggage, —my knapsack, my blanket, and my wading boots. (The dash without the comma would be slightly preferable.)

See also Comma and Dash.

4. Sometimes, in pairs, to inclose parenthetical matter less definitely separated from the remainder of the sentence than parentheses would indicate, and more so than commas would indicate.

Example: I went to see him—you wouldn't think it, but I did—without the slightest misgiving.

When the dash is used in combination with a comma as treated in 3 above, the dash follows the comma. Occasionally a comma may follow a dash used to indicate omission, as in 2 above.

The Interrogation Point, or Question Mark [?]

The interrogation point is used:

1. At the conclusion of every direct question.

   Examples: Who is the boy?
   He asked, "Who is the boy?"
   "Who is the boy?" he asked.

   In the second example, note that although the sentence is as a whole declarative, the interrogation point of the question within it is, except for quotation marks, the final punctuation of the sentence. In the third example note that the interrogation point comes at the end of the question and not at the end of the sentence.

   A sentence declarative in form may be interrogative in purpose and punctuation.

   Example:
   "Then I am to come tomorrow?"

   In conversation a sentence or fragment of a sentence not clearly understood, or with some phase of its meaning not fully brought out, may be repeated or echoed—perhaps with a slight adaptation in form—with a questioning inflection, as though to ask, "Do I understand you correctly?" or, "What is the meaning of this?"

   Example:
   "I think you would like to come."
   "Like to come? I like to come? Why, of course!"

   The interrogation point is not used at the end of an indirect question. Note the following (both correct):

   Indirect, natural: I should like to ask who built that bridge.

Oh expresses sharp or striking emotion, and is usually followed at once by the exclamation point.

Examples:

"Break, break, break,
On thy cold gray stones, O sea!"

"O well for the sailor lad That he sings in his boat on the bay!"

Oh! I never thought of that.

If the feeling is slight, a comma instead of an exclamation point will suffice for many interjections.

Example: Her interest, alas, is not difficult to understand.

4. Sometimes, in parentheses, to express astonishment, doubt, or irony, usually at the employment of some special expression or at some opinion professed. This use should not be overworked. Cf. Interrogation Point, 5.

Example: The speaker assured us that under the present highly satisfactory (!) conditions throughout the protectorate, the sentiment in favor of independence would rapidly disappear.

Parentheses, or Parenthesis Marks [( )]

Parentheses are used:

1. To set off matter interpolated into the midst of sentence structure, or occasionally some larger unit, but in some measure connected with it. The material within the parentheses may itself have full sentence structure, or

Example: Like the room of which Spenser writes, "But overgrowne [sic] with dust and old decay."

Quotation Marks [" "]

Quotation marks are called double quotation marks (abbreviated in printing usage to double quotes) when it is necessary to distinguish them from single quotation marks.

Double quotation marks are used:

1. To set off a direct quotation.

   Example: He said, "I will come."

   They are not used in connection with an indirect quotation.

   Example: He said that he would come.

   At the beginning of every paragraph of prose quoted, the beginning quotation marks should be used. If the paragraphs quoted are consecutive within the same work, put closing punctuation marks only at the end of the last. At the beginning of every stanza of verse quoted, opening quotation marks should be placed. Indicate omissions, and use closing quotation marks after the last material quoted from the poem. There is a growing tendency in printing, particularly with respect to verse, to put long quotations into a recognizably different style of type and to dispense with quotation marks.

2. Sometimes, to indicate titles of books or of written articles, lectures, sermons, or poems, and of works of art or music, names of vessels, express trains, estates, etc. Italics are often used for titles, especially of books; and are preferred for the names of vessels, express trains, and the like; occasionally, as in newspaper usage, these are written without any mark or change of type.

   Example: Millet's "The Angelus."

3. To indicate designations or expressions for the employment of which the writer does not wish to assume full responsibility, thus implying a certain attitude of apology for the term set off. The too liberal use of quotation marks for this purpose, especially in the cases under (c) and (d) below, becomes unpleasantly intrusive upon the attention of the reader, and constitutes a distinct weakness of style. Employed with care, however, this use is an asset:

   (a) Sometimes, it merely guards against the assumption that the writer approves of the meaning.

   Example: After the "riot," the meeting quickly adjourned.

   (b) Often, it repeats ironically some term used by a previous speaker or writer, the suitability or good taste of which is by implication called into question.

   Example: The Mayor tells us that he was then engaged in receiving distinguished visitors. After the departure of this "distinguished" company, what did the Mayor do?

   (c) Often, it utilizes some expression from which it withholds approval on grounds of usage.

   Example: He was then very nearly "on his uppers," as they say.

   (d) Sometimes, it is used to mark nicknames or the like when these have not become accepted designations.

Single quotation marks are used to mark off a quotation within a quotation.

Example: He said, "My father's words to me as we left were, 'Come home early.' "

In the rare cases in which further degrees of interior quotation appear, double and single quotation marks are used alternately.

Example: He said, "My father's words to me as I left him were, 'Remember that mother said, "Bring ice cream." ' "

English practice, and some American practice following it, reverses the functions of the double and the single quotation marks.

If a mark of punctuation is called for at the end of a quotation by the sense of the quotation, it is placed inside the closing quotation marks.

If a mark of punctuation is called for by the sentence within which the quotation is only an element, it is placed outside the closing quotation marks. An exception to this rule, however, is that, for typographical reasons, general printing usage places the comma and the period invariably within the final quotation marks, and this usage now prevails for written work as well.

Examples:

It is not well to say, "How should I know?"

Does anyone like to confess, "I do not know"?

How unsatisfactory it is to say, "I don't know"!

It is unsatisfactory to say, "I don't know."

If you must say, "I don't know," say it promptly.

Note that the signs for opening quotation marks, in printing and in careful writing, are like elevated inverted commas and have the heavy part down [“].

Apostrophe [']

The apostrophe is used:

1. To indicate that one or more letters or figures, usually easily supplied from the context, have been omitted.

   Examples:
   'tween (poetic for between); '76 (presumably for 1776); '49 (presumably for 1849).
   don't (do not); it's (it is); 'tis (it is); you're (you are); he'd (he had or he would); I'll (I will or I shall).

   Shan't (shall not) and won't (woll not, variant of will not) are commonly written with one apostrophe only, though sha'n't and wo'n't also occur. Ain't (for am not, are not: used also for is not) and hain't (for have not, has not)—erroneous forms which, nevertheless, it is sometimes necessary to represent in writing—commonly have only the single apostrophe.

2. In the formation of the possessive of nouns. The apostrophe of the singular does not mark the abbreviation of his, as is often supposed, but stands for an e of -es, a former genitive ending of many nouns. The expression "John Doe his book," formerly common, is the expansion of "John Doe's book" to the form of which it was mistakenly supposed to be a contraction.

   Examples: boy's, boys', men's, lass's. See Inflection, p. 1404.

   Note that the apostrophe is not used in forming the possessive of pronouns proper (except in the Bible).

   Examples: ours, your, yours, his, hers, its, theirs, whose.

   Distinguish particularly your (belonging to you) from you're (you are), its (belonging to it) from it's (it is), and whose (belonging to whom) from who's (who is or who has). But certain expressions, formerly adjectives used as substantives, or nouns, and occasionally regarded somewhat loosely as pronouns, utilize the apostrophe in forming their possessives.

   Examples: one's, each other's, another's, one another's, somebody else's (also, anybody else's nobody else's), etc.

3. The apostrophe is used to indicate the plural of figures, letters, short words, marks, sounds, and the like, considered as visual or vocal symbols.

   Examples:
   His 3's look like 8's.
   Dot your i's and cross your t's.
   There are too many that's in the sentence.
   His :'s and ;'s are hard to distinguish.

Hyphen [-]

The hyphen is not in the strict sense a mark of punctuation at all, but is naturally associated with the punctuation marks. It is used:

1. At the end of a line, to indicate that one or more syllables of a word are in the line following.

2. Somewhat arbitrarily, in words (called compound words) composed of two or more elements, to indicate that the elements are not completely fused into one word, as in full-fledged, brother-in-law, etc. In many such words usage varies; the only safe course is to decide which dictionary is to be followed, and to consult it in all cases of doubt. Such hyphens are sometimes printed heavier or doubled, to distinguish them from syllable hyphens (see 3, below).

   Examples: set-off; self-de-ni-al; self=de-ni-al.

3. To divide a word into syllables, as in dictionaries, or to set off any element of a word, as a prefix or suffix.

   Examples: jel-ly-fish; proc-ess; the affixes in the word un-manage-able.

4. In a variety of uses, to indicate slight separation, as between figures and letters in telephone numbers or in connection with the combinations of safes.

5. In a variety of cases in which one or more words are temporarily joined to indicate that they form a single unit, or to prevent misunderstandings that would be possible if the words were left separate. In actual practice, however, there is little uniformity of usage.

   Example: The committee decided to put on a better-housing campaign.

   This refers to a campaign for better housing. But if the speaker means a better campaign for housing (that is, better than some other community has put on), the hyphen should not be used.

   Example: We object to his free-trade work (work in behalf of free trade).

Marking Omissions [. . .] [* * *]

A row of dots (leaders) may be used to indicate an omission, usually of words, phrases, sentences, or passages of considerable length. Sometimes, chiefly in narrative, such dots indicate a train of thought not presented in the account.

A row of asterisks (stars) is sometimes used to indicate omission, often implying also the lapse of time.

Dashes, as we have seen, may indicate omission, but usually the omission of figures, letters, words, or short expressions, that are either understood or of little significance.

Comma and Dash [,—]

The comma and dash, though somewhat in disfavor as constituting double punctuation, has a certain usefulness. For introducing a short enumeration scarcely formal enough for a colon, and perhaps having comma punctuation within, the comma and dash is by some felt to picture the nature of the pause more closely and less abruptly than does the dash alone. A colon suggests a premeditated enumeration; a comma and dash, an interesting afterthought.

Examples:

I found myself taking a walk with my three relatives,—my uncle, my nephew, and my cousin.

I returned for my luggage,—my knapsack, my blanket, and my wading boots.

We already knew that water had three forms; he pointed out that carbon likewise had three familiar forms,—carbon so called, graphite, and diamond.

The comma and dash is no longer favored after the salutation of letters. Use a colon or, if the letter is intimate in tone, a comma.

III. IDIOMS

Idiom in the broadest sense signifies whatever is individual and characteristic in a language. In a narrower sense, an idiom is an expression, consisting of more than a single word, that is specially characteristic of the language in which it occurs. Although idioms have come about by rational processes, they are often no longer readily explainable in terms of the literal meaning of their parts, and are to be accepted or rejected as units.

Idioms, like single words, are of all grades of dignity and status. Some will be rejected at once by the careful speaker; but accepted idioms add much to the force and flexibility of language, so that their use is not merely to be tolerated but encouraged.

The main vocabulary of the Dictionary is particularly rich in its inclusion of idioms.

acquiesce: followed by in, not with. See accede, Syn., in main vocabulary.

administer. Blows are dealt. Medicine is administered. See also main vocabulary for commoner meanings.

advise: in commercial parlance often used pretentiously for inform; as, I beg to advise you that our agent will call next week.

ain't: always wrong.

alike: use without both in some constructions.

Wrong: They are both alike in this particular.

Right: They are alike in this particular.

Right: I have two boys, and try to treat them alike (preferably not both alike).

all over: avoid in some usages in which over all expresses the meaning better.

Right: The water flowed over all the land; when it receded there were pools all over all the land.

allow: do not use for assert or promise.

Wrong: He allowed that he would be there.

all right: correctly written thus. The single-word form with one l has no respectable status, though we have all together and altogether, all ready and already.

allude means to refer indirectly; as, the speaker alluded to the presence of a distinguished guest in the audience.

almost: correct as an adverb. See most.

alone: it is better modern prose usage not to give the adjective alone the sense of only.

Less desirable: Charles alone will come.

Preferable: Only Charles will come.

Distinguish from: Charles will come alone (that is, unaccompanied).

and, as in try and do it, to introduce verbs dependent in thought: see to.

angry at is commonly used of things, animals, or causes; if angry at is used of a person, the anger covers not merely the point at issue, but the whole range of personal relations; angry with is the idiom that should, as a rule, be used with respect to persons.

answer applies to questions or to whatever implies a question, as an accusation or a charge; it is now, also, commonly used of correspondence; reply to is broader and may imply a difference not merely in content but in form from what is expected. One may reply to a charge by shifting ground or by an act which does not afford a direct answer.

anticipate, expect: it is best to regard anticipate as implying foretaste of some emotion, usually pleasure, and not to use it for other usages of expect. For further senses of anticipate. see the main vocabulary.

Inadvisable: I do not anticipate that it will rain Saturday.

Right: I already anticipate the good times we shall have on our camping trip.

any: incorrect in adverbial sense of at all; correct as a substantive.

Wrong: I cannot encourage you any.

Right: I should like to give you tickets, but I haven't any.

any place: incorrect for to any place; anywhere is usually the appropriate expression.

Wrong: Shall we go any place today?

Right: Shall we go anywhere today?

anywheres: wrong for anywhere.

apt implies fitness, suitability, or inherent tendency; as, an apt reply; a sympathetic person is apt to have friends; liable implies at least the threat of sinister or unfavorable results; as, liable for damages; liable to get hurt;

likely implies probability, sometimes promise, such as readily appeals to belief; of the three words it is the least specialized in meaning. See apt, Syn., in main vocabulary.

a'n't I, aren't I: dialectal or colloquial for am I not: not in good general usage.

as, so: after negatives most authorities prefer so to as. So is more explicit than as. Accordingly, some authorities distinguish: not so warm as yesterday implies that yesterday was actually warm, but not as warm as yesterday does not indicate whether yesterday was warm or not.

as, for that or whether: avoid.

Wrong: I do not know as I can tell you.

Right: I do not know whether I can tell you.

Wrong: I don't say as he can do it.

Right: I don't say that he can do it.

at all: superfluous after any, but often used to give special emphasis.

avenge (verb) implies righteous retribution; revenge (noun and verb) implies selfish gratification of resentment, and even malice;
vengeance (noun) is more personal than avenge and less malign than revenge.

awful, awfully: do not use to intensify an adjective. In using awful with nouns recall that it means inspiring with awe, solemn.

Wrong: He was awful good to me.

Wrong: She was awfully pretty.

Wrong: They couldn't agree at all, and they had an awful row about it.

back: do not use for ago.

Inadvisable: Three days back I saw him.

Right: Three days ago I saw him.

back of: do not say in back of. Idiom sanctions in front of but not in back of.

Back of has some currency, but behind is generally to be preferred.

balance: do not use for remainder.

Wrong: The firm will be in new quarters for the balance of the year.

between, of two (occasionally of a larger group within which there is a duality of relation);
among, of more than two. Cf. each other, one another.

Right: What is one among so many?

Right (common use): Between the adjoining properties there is a fence.

Right (special use): We have also to consider the relations between the states.

biweekly, properly, once every two weeks; for twice a week prefer semiweekly.

blame it on: avoid.

Inadvisable: Don't blame it on me!

Correct: Don't blame me for it!

but, meaning only: use no other negative in the same clause.

Wrong: I haven't met but four.

Right: I have met but four.

but only: do not use both words if the meaning is except.

Wrong: No one was there but only Charles.

Right: No one was there but (or except) Charles. Cf. only.

but that, but what. See that.

calculate: do not use for suppose.

can expresses ability;
may expresses permission or possibility.

Right: May I leave early tonight?

Right: Can he run a hundred yards in ten seconds?

Occasionally may stresses bare possibility; as, he may call today, but I do not expect him.

can but means can only; cannot but is an idiom for cannot help. There is sometimes a difference between these in meaning and always in emphasis. He can but go means that to go is all that he can do: either the most that he can do or the only thing that he can do. He cannot but go means that the circumstances or considerations that lead him to go are overpowering.

cannot but, cannot help: note the constructions that follow these phrases. Cannot but go, cannot help going illustrate the correct usage. Cannot help but go is a double construction that should be avoided.

certain, sure: both assert the existence of strong conviction; certain occasionally sets more emphasis upon the grounds on which the conviction rests.

character refers to what we are;
reputation is what we are considered to be. In a semitechnical sense, character is sometimes used of an employer's estimate of a servant.

claim: do not use loosely for say, or for assert unless there is some question of right or title involved.

Wrong: He claims that he was there.

compare to means to liken to, possibly in only one particular; compare with means to examine in conjunction with, with respect to qualities, properties, or impressions. Roosevelt might be compared with any common citizen; he once compared himself to a bull moose.

complected: do not use this or its compounds. Complexioned is correct, but a less awkward construction is often possible.

Correct but awkward: She is dark-complexioned.

Improved: She has a dark complexion.

correspond to implies more definiteness and closeness of correspondence than does correspond with in the latter's similar sense. Both are correct. Correspond with also means to communicate with by letters back and forth.

data (dā'tȧ): historically a plural and still to be so regarded. The singular datum occurs, but not often.

Wrong: This data is submitted. . . .

Right: These data are submitted. . . .

date: avoid in the sense of an engagement.

depot: the word is connected with deposit, and is applied to a military storehouse, and, by extension, to a freight station. Its use for passenger station, though common in the United States, lacks sanction. Prefer station.

Right: He was long sick with rheumatism but died of pneumonia.

different from is correct. British usage sometimes employs different to. Different than is to be avoided.

differ from: to be different from;
differ with: to have a disagreement with.

disremember: say forget.

due to: this expression is correct only when due, an adjective, modifies some substantive. Its use as an adverbial equivalent of because of, owing to, is not sanctioned.

Wrong: He became sick, due to the unhealthful fog.

Right: He suffered from sickness, due to the unhealthful fog.

each other, of two (occasionally of a larger group within which there is a duality of relation);
one another, of more than two. Cf. between.

Right: The several conferees then departed, well pleased with one another.

Right (common use): James and John saw each other often.

Right (special use): I hope the pupils and their advisers will see each other often.

enthuse: this word lacks sanction. The noun enthusiasm, however, is in thoroughly good repute.

equally as, though gramatically defensible, lacks sanction. Use either but not both.

Poor: This plan is equally as good.

Right: The return trip was equally delightful.

Right: The return trip was as delightful.

The second usage is perhaps a trifle less emphatic.

Esq.: do not use with Mr.

etc.: abbreviation for et cetera, usually rendered "and so forth." Do not say and etc., as et is the Latin word for and.

Wrong: Lead, tin, zinc, and etc., for sale.

Right: Lead, tin, zinc, etc., for sale;

&c., a less formal way of writing the same thing, is rarely used in ordinary composition.

The use of etc. when a definite term is called for is unpleasing, and is particularly objectionable in work designed to be impressive.

Wrong: Yours, etc.

Wrong: He was honest, faithful, devoted, etc., through all his service.

every which way: inelegant. Prefer in all directions.

facts: do not use with true. All facts are true. The phrases supposed facts and alleged facts, seemingly exceptions to the foregoing, make use of a participial idiom not wholly logical but in accordance with modern usage.

fell: the past tense of the verb fall; also, the present form of a verb meaning cause to fall, cut down; as, to fell a tree.

fewer: used of numbers;
less: used of amount. We speak of fewer fishes or less fish; but notice that even with numerals amount rather than number may be uppermost in thought. Less than ten years is better than fewer than ten years. Cf. many, much.

firstly: the form first is better established, even for the adverbial use.

Preferable: He intended, first, to visit friend; secondly, to deliver a message; thirdly, to raise money.

fix: do not use for repair, except in the sense of making something stable or stationary. We do not fix an automobile. Do not use for arrange; as, to fix the hair; or for prepare; as, to fix lunch.

a great deal of, a good deal of: good colloquialisms, the former having a trifle more dignity.

guess: do not use for suppose.

had ought to, hadn't ought to: both forms are wrong, whether the time referred to is past or present. The verb ought is incomplete and has no past participle. Say ought not to, ought not to have.

had rather, had better, had best: these are all well established in English idiom. Would rather is a synonym for had rather, but is of no better standing. Would better and would best may be used, but they are less free, occasionally causing ambiguity with respect to the meaning of would and should, and affording no real advantage. Would better is not an exact synonym for had better.

hardly: this word itself carries a negative idea and should not be used with not.
Wrong: I couldn't hardly do it.
Right: I could hardly do it.

have: enunciate this word clearly. In speech it may break down to ha', 'a', or of. Avoid such use as in If I had of (have) known.

heaps: do not use for very much.
Wrong: I like it heaps.

hopes: when used of a single prospect, prefer hope to hopes.
Inadvisable: I have no hopes of seeing him before winter.
Right: I have no hope of seeing him before winter.

how, as how: do not use loosely for that.
Wrong: He answered how he couldn't return for a week.

however: do not use the single word for its parts; write the two words. It is also idiomatic to separate them by other words.
Wrong: However could I have done this?
Right: How could I ever have done this?

identified with: improper for employed by or associated with, in the business sense.
Wrong: Mr. Jones, the retiring clerk, has long been identified with the firm.

in back of: wrong: see back of.

inside: used as a preposition this word should not be followed by of; as a noun it may be followed by of.
Right: He stayed inside the yard.
Right: The inside of the house seemed less attractive.

in under: incorrect for under.
Wrong: It rolled in under the desk.
Right: It rolled under the desk.
Note, however, that the emphatic in may sometimes be correctly used before under to express a special phase of meaning.
Right (special use): They put the coal in under the stairs. Put in is really to be regarded as a verb phrase here.

invent, discover: to invent is to devise something that has not previously existed, or, sometimes, to devise something independently of a previous invention; to discover is to find something that has previously existed. See discover, Syn., in main vocabulary.

just: do not use for completely.
Wrong: It was just sweet of you to call.

kind: say this kind, that kind, not these kind, those kind.

kind of: do not use in the sense of slightly.
Inadvisable: He was kind of sickly all last winter.

laundered: not laundried.

learn: to acquire knowledge;
teach: to impart knowledge. The use of learn in the sense of teach was once correct, but is now definitely wrong.

leave: do not use for let. Prefer let me go to leave me go. Use let me alone to mean do not interfere with me; use leave me alone to mean depart, allow me to be in solitude.

let on: avoid in the sense pretend or (chiefly with a negative) to make known, disclose.
Wrong: He let on that he was sick.
Wrong: He didn't let on that I had told him anything.

let's don't: wrong for colloquial don't let's.

liable. See apt.

like: do not use as a conjunction equivalent to as if or as though. It may be correctly used as an adjective.
Wrong: It looks like it would rain.
Right: It looks as if it would rain.

likely. See apt.

loan: some authorities object to any use of loan as a verb. It is best at all events to restrict such use to the formal placing of a loan as a transaction, as by a bank. For the ordinary verb counterpart of the noun loan, use lend.

long: the general word; lengthy, strikingly long; usually, somewhat too long. A lengthy discourse makes its hearers impatient and may bore them.

lots of, a lot of, meaning many, much: questionable colloquialisms; the former particularly is challenged. For good colloquialisms prefer a great deal of, a good deal of.

majority: do not confuse with plurality. See majority, Syn., in main vocabulary.

many refers to number, and is used with the plural;

much refers to quantity, and is used with the singular.
Right: many irons, much iron; many fishes, much fish. Cf. fewer, less.

Messrs.: do not use unless it is followed by a proper noun. Usually there must be more than one proper noun; occasionally, as in the case of brothers or of namesakes, a single noun will suffice.
Right: Messrs. Wells and Shaw will meet the Messrs. Chesterton.

most: do not use for almost. Frequently these words indicate very different meanings. Most intelligent is very different from almost intelligent.

most, more than: these expressions, in instances such as those below, involve different constructions if the same meaning is to be expressed.

Wrong: Your sample is more satisfactory than any that I have seen.

Right: Your sample is more satisfactory than any other that I have seen.

Right: Your sample is the most satisfactory that I have seen.

Avoid: Your sample is the most satisfactory of any that I have seen.

Right: Your sample is the most satisfactory of all that I have seen.

not but what: avoid.

Inadvisable: Not but what I could have overtaken him if I had wished.

Allowable (but elliptical): Not that I could not have overtaken him if I had wished.

nowheres: wrong for nowhere. Likewise anywheres for anywhere, somewheres for somewhere.

off for of or from: avoid.

Wrong: I bought this set off the local dealer.

Right: I bought this set from the local dealer.

But note that some verbs take off as a matter of idiom.

Right: He took this set off my hands.

off of: use off alone.

Wrong: He got off of the horse.

Right: He got off the horse.

one: for the pronoun one, meaning a single one, the possessive is his.

Right: I saw two of them, and one waved his hand.

For the impersonal one the possessive is commonly his in American usage and commonly one's in modern British usage, though variations in each occur. One's seems to some more careful; one's sounds stilted to many persons, particularly when the term is repeated. Similarly he, him, referring to one, are common in American usage.

Allowable: In the river country, one makes his way by canoe.

Allowable: If one is in the river country, he may have to depend upon his canoe.

Allowable: In the river country, one makes one's way by canoe.

The reflexive is more closely linked with the word to which it refers than are other forms; hence, oneself is not uncommon; but himself is also in common use. Use oneself rather than one's self, which, however, is also allowable.

one another. See each other.

only (adverb): the clearest position for the adverb only to occupy is immediately before or sometimes immediately after the word or construction it is intended to modify. In spoken language, with the inflection of the voice to guide, it may be natural and even idiomatic to take greater liberties, but in written discourse exact placement is frequently helpful and sometimes important. He stayed there only three days is preferable to He only stayed there three days, if the shortness of his stay is the idea to be emphasized.

It should be recognized, however, that only sometimes modifies not one word, but a group of words of which the word that follows it is a part; as, "drink to me only with thine eyes." Sometimes only vocal inflection or the context will tell whether only modifies a word or a longer expression. If in a given situation the natural use of only gives rise to a real ambiguity in meaning, or to an important uncertainty as to emphasis, recourse should be had to some other construction. Note the following:

He only copied the introductions.

Does this mean that copying was all he did with respect to the introductions, or that copying introductions was the extent of his duties, or that he alone did the copying?

only: do not use as a preposition; recast the sentence.

Wrong: No one was there only Charles.

Right: Only Charles was there; or, no one was there except Charles. Cf. but only.

only that: prefer except that when this is the meaning.

Inadvisable: Your umbrella is the better, only that the handle is not so convenient.

Right: Your umbrella is the better, except that the handle is not so convenient.

onto: use only when on or upon will not quite express the meaning.

otherwise than: not otherwise but.

Right: How could I be otherwise than glad at such an opportunity?

ought. See had ought.

pair of: as a rule, adjectives should go with the noun that follows, rather than with pair; sometimes they may properly go with pair; as, a pair of new boots, not a new pair of boots; but a well-chosen pair of boots, a well-matched pair of horses.

party: do not use loosely for person. A person may be a party to a contract, to a suit at law, to an agreement, to a dispute, or in certain other clear-cut relations; but ordinarily party signifies a number of persons.

posted: do not use for informed.

present, in the sense of make acquainted, is considerably more formal than introduce, which is usually the suitable term. The imperatives "Meet" and "Shake hands with" are both objectionable as forms of introduction.

promise: distinguish from assure. Promise looks toward a later fulfilment.

Wrong: I was there yesterday, I promise you.

Right: I was there yesterday, I assure you.

Wrong: I know what the matter is, I promise you.

Wrong: I can tell what the matter is, I promise you.

Right: I will tell what the matter is, I promise you.

quite some time: avoid; prefer a good while.

real: do not use real to modify an adjective. Really is the correct form. Often very, or some livelier synonym, is what fits the sense.

Wrong: He was real kind to me yesterday.

Possible (but probably inaccurate): He was really kind to me yesterday.

Right: He was extremely kind to me yesterday.

the reason is that: not the reason is because.

Wrong: The reason is because there is no gasoline.

Right: The reason is that there is no gasoline.

reckon: do not use for suppose.

recollect implies the act of recalling to consciousness; remember means to hold in memory, subject to such recall.

Right: I remembered his face, but it was only with difficulty that I could recollect his name and title.

regards: do not use for regard.

Wrong: I talked with him in regards to the subscription.

Right: I talked with him in (or with) regard to the subscription.

Right: Emma sends her regards to you.

same, the same: do not use in place of an ordinary pronoun. This may be approved in legal usage, and is much used in business correspondence, but it is not our ordinary idiom.

Avoid: I have returned the goods, and wish you would examine the same.

Right: I have returned the goods, and wish you would examine them.

seeing as how: wrong for inasmuch as or since.

Wrong: Seeing as how he was there, he must know.

Right: Since he was there, he must know.

seem appeals to the thought; appear appeals to the senses. See seem, Syn., in main vocabulary.

semioccasionally: prefer occasionally, or (colloquially) once in a while.

settle: do not use for pay, if there has been neither confusion nor controversy in the matter.

sick with. See died of.

so: avoid the vague use of so with adjectives when there is no word to which to refer it. Perhaps not wholly wrong, it quickly tires, and may become irritating.

Inadvisable: They were all so good to me and I saw them so often, and so many people have said to me so many times. . . .

Correct: They were so good to me that I shall never forget them.

so after negatives is generally to be preferred to as. See as.

Undesirable: He is not as good as Charles.

Improved: He is not so good as Charles.

so, in the sense of therefore, should not be overworked. Too frequent employment of it makes sentences seem childish. A comma preceding it is usually a mistake in punctuation or indicates a structure of a type for which so is not suited.

somebody else's: not somebody's else.

some place: do not use as an adverb for somewhere. Cf. any place.

Wrong: Let's go some place today.

Right: Let's go somewhere today.

so before an adjective, as in so interesting a speaker, is grammatically correct, but the expression such an interesting speaker is more natural and is justified by usage. In some cases so is preferable, as in she has so little patience.

sometime, an adverb meaning at a time, past or future, not known or not definitely stated; also, an adjective meaning former;

some time, an adjective and a noun;

sometimes, an adverb meaning on certain occasions; now and then;

some times, an adjective and a noun.

Right: I will see you sometime.

Right: James Smith, sometime Commissioner of Education. This use is somewhat uncommon.

Right: I have not been there for some time.

Right: I sometimes go by train.

Right: Some times are better than others for a visit.

splendid: do not use profusely and vaguely as a term of praise. By derivation the word means shining. Like other similar terms, it is capable of being used figuratively, but it should not be overworked. Similarly, guard against vagueness and inappropriateness in the use of such words as fine, magnificent, nice, lovely, beautiful, wonderful, great, stunning; awful, fearful, terrible.

stop at: in the sense of live temporarily at, be quartered at (a hotel) is the regular newspaper expression, and has very extensive use. It is, however, frowned on by some.

Commonly heard: He is stopping at the Imperial.

Right: He is staying at the Imperial.

suspicion: not a verb. Suspect (sŭs-pĕkt′) is the verb; suspect (sometimes, sŭs′pĕkt) is a noun meaning a person suspected.

that: preferable to but that or but what after a word such as doubt.

Wrong: I do not doubt but what he will be there.

Inadvisable: I do not doubt but that he will be there.

Right: I do not doubt that he will be there.

After know, but that may be used for a special meaning. "Who knows but that the King may come?" is a softened and more evenly balanced equivalent of "Who knows that the King will not come?"

the: repeated to indicate separate individuals. In certain situations the repetition or omission of the after and will serve to indicate whether the meaning refers to one person serving in two capacities or to two persons.

Two persons: We expect the secretary and the treasurer to be present.

One person: We expect the secretary and treasurer to be present.

Clearly two persons: The carpenter and the painter had arrived.

Possibly one person: The carpenter and painter had arrived.

throwed: wrong for threw.

Wrong: And then he went and just throwed the game away!

thusly: avoid this humorous variant of thus.

to: do not use carelessly for on.

Wrong: There was a rug to the floor.

Right: There was a rug on the floor.

In a few idiomatic phrases, in which the idea of attachment or close application underlies, this use is still correct.

Right: a tail to the kite, a string to the bow, not a shirt to one's back.

Note, however, that the proverbial shirt to one's back does not mean exactly the same as a shirt on one's back.

to, and (with verbs): use to rather than and with go, try, and sometimes come, when the idea that follows is one of purpose.

Inadvisable: I will go and see him.

Improved: I will go to see him.

Inadvisable: I will try and attend the meeting.

Improved: I will try to attend the meeting.

Inadvisable: He said he would come and make the repairs tomorrow.

Improved: He said he would come to make the repairs tomorrow.

Where purpose is absent or where, though present, it should not receive stress, the construction with and may be retained. This principle applies chiefly in the matter of invitations with come.

Preferable: Won't you come and have lunch with me?

transpire: do not use for happen. The word means come to be known, leak out.

very: be careful not to use overmuch. In particular, do not use carelessly with words that do not admit of being intensified. Often such use offends, and usually it weakens.

Wrong: The pickles were very excellent.

Right: The pickles were excellent.

Wrong: The pain was very excruciating.

Right: The pain was excruciating.

very (with participles): do not use very without some intervening adverb unless the participial form has recognition also as a participal adjective.

Wrong: He was very amused at her.

Right: He was very much amused (or highly amused) at her.

Right: He was very tired, and we were both very dejected.

way: not ways, in the sense of a short distance.

Wrong: He was a little ways ahead.

Right: He was a little way ahead.

when: do not use for than.

Wrong: I had no sooner taken my place when my friend entered.

Right: I had no sooner taken my place than my friend entered.

when (inverted construction): do not use when to introduce a clause that contains the main idea. Sometimes whereupon will give the right balance to the sentence; oftener the when should be transferred to the other clause.

Undesirable: He arrived at the station, when he found the doctor there to meet him.

Right: When he arrived at the station, he found the doctor there to meet him.

when, where (in definitions): do not use is when or is where in defining.

Poor: Trolling is when you draw the line through the water by the motion of the boat.

Improved: Trolling is drawing the line through the water by the motion of the boat.

without: do not use for unless.

Undesirable: I shall not go without he agrees.

Right: I shall not go unless he agrees.

Right: I shall not go without his agreeing.

would rather, would best, would better. See had rather.

you was: incorrect for you were.

you and I: correct for all nominative constructions;

you and me: correct for all objective constructions.

Wrong: between you and I.

Right: between you and me.

CONSTRUCTIONS

don't (that is, do not): do not use for doesn't; that is, when he, she, or it is the subject.

It is I. Although there are reasons from both historical and colloquial usage why it is me, which was good usage in Shakespeare's day, might have continued to receive sanction, careful modern usage has definitely pronounced in favor of it is I. Occasional attempts to revive a sanction for it is me have not been sufficiently convincing to authorize it for formal written work.

Order of pronouns. In English it is not good form to place the first personal singular (I, my, mine, me) before other pronouns. In Latin the reverse was true.

Discourteous: I and you are to stay.

Right: You and I are to stay.

Discourteous: He will answer me and you at the same time.

Right: He will answer you and me at the same time.

Ordinarily the second person (you, your, yours, ye) takes precedence not only of the first person but of the third. The governing principle is for the speaker to honor the person whom he is addressing with first mention and to keep himself in the background. This principle becomes more flexible when plurals are involved, especially when the we in question involves both the person addressed and the speaker.

Perfect infinitive. The perfect infinitive should be used in reference to action occurring prior to that of the main verb.

Wrong: If he had wished to have gone, he would have been at the station.

Right: If he had wished to go, he would have been at the station.

Defensible: I hoped to have seen it when you should arrive.

Simpler: I hoped to see it before you should arrive.

Possessive before a gerund. A noun or pronoun used to modify a gerund should be in the possessive and not the objective case.

Wrong: There is no chance of him giving to the fund.

Right: There is no chance of his giving to the fund.

This error probably results from confusion with the construction of noun with participle modifying it, which in some cases is entirely correct, and that of gerund with noun modifying it, each construction being right for its particular shade of meaning.

Noun and participle: Charles has been elected captain; and with him playing at full back we can be confident of victory.

Noun (possessive) modifying a gerund: With Charles's playing his opponent could offer nothing to compare.

Preposition at the end of the sentence. The end of a sentence is not infrequently the most natural and idiomatic place for a preposition. Since the end of a sentence is a position of natural emphasis and since a preposition is usually of less weight than other elements in the sentence, some grammarians advise against putting a preposition at the close. But the reasons against this construction are not decisive and may be freely dismissed on the frequent occasions when ending a sentence with a preposition is natural or effective.

Split infinitive. The use of some word or words, typically an adverb, between to (sometimes called the sign of the infinitive) and the remainder of the infinitive is known as splitting the infinitive. This usage has been seriously attacked by a number of writers, who have endeavored to stigmatize it as a vulgar error, and strenuously defended by others as both warrantable and useful. It is said to afford greater freedom both in formulating expression and in distributing emphasis. If it is employed, there should be recognition that some conservative taste is likely to be offended; but on the whole the tendency seems to be to regard the usage more and more as a matter of personal taste, and less and less as a criterion of good taste.

Split infinitives: to really do, to imperiously demand, to clearly and repeatedly show, to fortunately be free.

Note that the following are not split infinitives, though they are often so regarded: to be unavoidably detained; to have thoroughly enjoyed. The participle (detained, enjoyed), though inflectionally necessary, is not the essential part of the infinitive construction.

The obvious remedy is to place the adverb or other intruding element somewhere else, usually either just before or just after the infinitive. Occasionally this seems to change the emphasis or to create fresh problems. Sometimes the sentence must be entirely recast if a satisfactory solution is to result.

IV. COMMON ERRORS IN SPEECH AND WRITING

The common errors of speech and writing fall for the most part into a few simple types. With respect to several of these types, the following examples will afford practical and concrete assistance.

Many instances in which one word is misused for another arise out of resemblance between the words themselves in sound or spelling. The following list presents only a few, of course, of the total number of these resemblances, but it includes a relatively large number of those that have been found to give extensive difficulty. Within the various word groups, the terms have in general been arranged in the order that best brings out the difficulty.

accept, consent to receive;
except, make an exception of.

advice (ăd-vīs′), the noun; advise (ăd-vīz′), the verb.

affect, to influence; also, to pretend to have (a given trait of character); to behave artificially; effect, to bring about. Effect as a noun means result; affect is not used as a noun, except in a technical psychological sense. Since to influence is to produce some result, it happens that the noun effect may occasionally be employed of an action for which the verb affect was used; but of course its direct connection is with the verb of the same form.
Right: The change affected him profoundly (or, had a profound effect on him).
Right: As soon as he took office, he effected sweeping reforms.

allude, to refer indirectly;
elude, to escape; avoid.

allusion, an indirect reference;
elusion, the act of escaping or avoiding;
illusion, a false appearance.
Similarly, allusive, elusive, illusive.

already, beforehand;
all ready, colloquial for completely ready; sometimes, every individual ready.
Compare: I have already seen it.
I am all ready to see it.
The visitors were all (that is, without exception) ready to see it.

altogether, completely;
all together, all in unison; all reckoned in one sum.

analyst, one who analyzes;
annalist, one who writes annals; a historian.

anecdote, a brief story, usually illustrative of some personal trait; antidote, a remedy.

angel, a spirit of heaven;
angle, a corner;
Angle, a member of a race of Teutons, associated with the Saxons and the Jutes.

Arcadian (är-kā′dĭ-ăn), pertaining to Arcadia, or Arcady, in Greece, or to an idealized land of idyllic pastoral existence traditionally associated with it;
Acadian (a-kā′dĭ-ăn), pertaining to Acadia, or Acadie, the designation of the former French holdings in Nova Scotia;
Akkadian (ă-kā′dĭ-ăn), pertaining to Akkad, or Accad, a city or a district in ancient Mesopotamia.

arrange, to put in order;
arraign (ă-rān′), to impeach; accuse.

aseptic (a-sĕp′tĭk), free from the germs of decay; surgically clean; antiseptic, preventing decay. See aseptic, antiseptic, in Dictionary of English Phrases.

assimilation, bringing into agreement; absorption; digestion; simulation, pretense.

audience sets emphasis on the group and on its size;
auditors sets emphasis on the individuals.

aureole (ô′rē-ōl), a halo;
oriole (ō′rĭ-ōl), the song bird;
oriel (ō′rĭ-ĕl), a projecting window structure.

averse, disinclined;
adverse, unfavorable; opposed.

awhile, for or during a short time: used only as an adverb;
for a while, an equivalent expression, in which while is a noun.
Right: ". . . which I have loved long since and lost awhile."
Right: He came a long while ago (or, a while ago).

blacking, a mixture for imparting a black color or luster; blackening, the rendering black or the growing black.

bouillon (bo͞ol′yŏn; bo͞o″yôn′), a clear soup; bullion (bo͞ol′yŭn), uncoined precious metal; also, a metallic fringe.

capital, the city;
capitol, the building.

careless, lacking in care;
callous, hardened; hence, hardened in feeling.

casual, chance; accidental;
causal, relating to cause and effect.

censure, to blame; condemn;
censor, to judge as to fitness or propriety; expurgate;
censer, a vessel for burning incense.

census board, popular for Bureau of the Census or its subsidiaries, engaged in enumerating the population; board of censors, see censor, above.

cervical, pertaining to the neck;
clavicle, the collar bone.

childish, having the weaker qualities of a child; foolish; childlike, having the good qualities of a child; frank; trustful.

climactic, in the order of climax; climatic, pertaining to climate;
climacteric, pertaining to a significant change; specifically (noun), the menopause, or change of life in women.

collision, violent encounter;
collusion, secret understanding; complicity.

compliment, an expression of approval or admiration; complement, that which serves to complete.

comprehensible, understandable; capable of being comprehended, or understood; comprehensive, capable of comprehending, or including; inclusive of much: often contrasted with compendious.

condemn, to denounce; censure;
contemn, to despise: somewhat quaint today: allied to the noun contempt.

condemnation, denunciation; censure; commendation, praise.

conscious, aware;
conscientious, possessing or characterized by a sensitive conscience.

contemptuous, entertaining or expressing contempt; contemptible, worthy of contempt.

continual refers to time and may apply to what is periodically interrupted and resumed;
continuous applies to that which is uninterrupted, and may refer to time or space.
Distinguish also from perpetual, everlasting; without end.

corporation, a corporate body or organization;
coöperation, joint effort.

correspondent, one who writes letters or articles;
corespondent (kō″rĕ-spŏn′dĕnt), a joint respondent or defendant in a suit, usually in a divorce suit.

council, a deliberative body;
counsel, advice; also, an adviser;
consul, a representative of a foreign government; also, a Roman executive magistrate.
Distinguish likewise councilor, counselor.

credible, worthy of belief;
creditable, worthy of receiving credit or praise;
credulous, foolishly disposed to believe.
Cf. incredible, incredulous.

cruise (krōōz), a voyage;
cruse (krōōs; krōōz), a small vessel; as, the widow's cruse of oil.

decompose, to separate into elements; decay or cause to decay; discompose, to disarrange; disturb; agitate.

decry, to disparage; censure loudly;
descry, to discern afar.

definite, exact; clear;
definitive (dē-fĭn′ĭ-tĭv), positive; final.

depositary is preferred for a person;
depository is preferred for a place.

deprecate, to plead against; disapprove; view with regret; depreciate, to lower; speak slightingly of.

desert (dē-zûrt′), (verb), to abandon; also (noun), due reward; merit; dessert (dē-zûrt′), (noun), a course sometimes served at the end of a dinner or luncheon; desert (dĕz′ẽrt), a solitary place: the noun corresponding to the verb desert, to abandon (listed above), but differently pronounced.

detract, to draw away; withdraw; also, to defame; distract, to draw (the attention) in various directions; confuse; disorder.

device (dē-vīs′), the noun;
devise (dē-vīz′), commonly a verb; also a noun in certain legal senses: see main vocabulary.

dictaphone, the business phonograph;
dictograph, the detective phonographic device.

eulogy, formal praise, not necessarily of one dead; an encomium.

elicit, to draw forth; educe;
illicit, illegal.

emigrant, one who removes from a country;
immigrant, one who moves into a country: note the doubling of the m.

eminent, distinguished;
imminent, impending;
immanent, indwelling; as, the conception of an immanent deity.

epithet, an adjective or a phrase denoting a characteristic; epitaph, an inscription on a monument.

etymology, the science of the derivation of words; entomology, the science of insects.

euphuism, an artificial, affectedly elaborate literary style of the sixteenth century;
euphemism, a less displeasing expression used in place of one that is plainer but more offensive; as, if anything should happen to him, for if he should be killed.

evolution, gradual, orderly development; revolution, abrupt change; an overturning. See main vocabulary for special meanings.

exceed, to go beyond: implying excess;
excel, to surpass: usually implying excellence.

exceedingly, very greatly;
excessively, too greatly.

exceptional, unusual;
exceptionable, affording ground for taking exception; objectionable.

excite, to rouse;
incite, to rouse or instigate to a particular action.

exercise (ĕk'sĕr-sīz), to exert; employ actively; keep in condition; also, chiefly in the passive, to worry, harass; exorcise (ĕk'sŏr-sīz), to expel by prayer or magic; also, to free from evil spirits.

exhilarate, to enliven, make glad: note the spelling; accelerate, to quicken: the correct term with respect to automobile action.

expect relates to the future;
suspect relates usually to the present, sometimes to the past or the future, and often implies something unfavorable or unpleasant. Sometimes suppose is better than either.

Right: I expect he will be there tomorrow.
Wrong: I expect he is now coming up the stairs.
Right: I suspect he is now coming up the stairs.
Wrong: I expect that you wish to see me.
Right: I suppose that you wish to see me.

expiate, to atone for;
expatiate, to talk freely and at length;
expatriate, to exile; banish.

extant, continuing to be existent; not destroyed, extinct, or lost; existent, existing; having actual being. The distinction is not wide; the second form is much the commoner; the difference in spelling should be noted; extent, measure; compass.

farther, preferred for distance; as, the farther limit, the farther stars: occurring more often as an adverb than as an adjective; as, to travel farther;
further, preferred for time or degree; as, a further instance, a further increase: occurring also as an adverb; as, to investigate further.

ferment, to produce fermentation in; hence, to excite or to become excited; foment, to bathe with medication; to foster; hence, usually, to incite; instigate; as, to foment revolt.

ferule, a measuring ruler or flat stick; ferrule, a small, cylindrical, metal cap or ring.

formerly, at a former time;
formally, in a formal manner.

forth, forward or out;
fourth, one of four equal parts that make up a whole.

freeze, to become congealed with cold;

indite (ĭn-dīt'), to write; compose.

ingenious, clever; skilfully contrived;
ingenuous, frank; artless.

interstate, between states;
intrastate, within a state;
intestate (ĭn-tĕs'tāt), not having made a will.

irreverent, lacking in reverence; irrelevant, lacking in pertinence; off the subject. Notice the difference in the position of the v sound, and in the final vowel.

its, belonging to it;
it's, a contraction meaning it is; 'tis.

later refers to time;
latter refers usually to position, as in a list or in casual mention.

leave, departure; also permission: see main vocabulary for detailed meanings;
lief, gladly. Do not use leave or leaves as an adverb.

Right: I gave him leave to go.
Right: I'd as lief go.
Wrong: I'd as leave go.

liar, one who tells falsehoods;
lier, one who reclines.

lie (past tense lay, past participle lain), to recline; for various other meanings, see main vocabulary: intransitive;
lay (past tense and past participle laid), to place; for various other meanings, see main vocabulary: mainly but not exclusively transitive.

lightning, the electrical flash and discharge characteristic of thunderstorms; lightening, present participle and gerund of the verb lighten in all senses, including the sense "to produce a flash of lightning."

liniment, a liquid for application to the skin;

missile, a projectile;
missal, a book of devotions.

mucus, the noun;
mucous, the adjective: pertaining to mucus.

neglect, preferred as a noun, when the emphasis is on the instance rather than on the character or attitude; negligence, preferred when the attitude of mind is to be stressed.

See neglect, Syn., in main vocabulary.

observance, the act of keeping, or paying attention to, laws or customs; also, a rite, ceremony, or custom; observation, the act of noting or examining; also, a remark.

oral (ō'rål), pertaining to the mouth; hence, usually, spoken;
aural (ô'rål), pertaining to the ear; auditory.

pagoda (på-gō'då), an eastern temple of many stories, taking the form of a tall, pyramidal tower; pergola (pûr'gŏ-lå), an arbor or trellis.

palate, the roof of the mouth;
palette, a plate for mixing colors;
pallet, a rough bed; also, any of various mechanical tools; also, a stripe in heraldry.

Parthenon, the temple of Athena on the Acropolis at Athens, preëminent in Greek architecture;
Pantheon, originally a temple dedicated to all the gods; specifically, one in Rome, now the Santa Maria Rotonda, which has been called "the noblest work of Roman architecture." See main vocabulary for full definitions, and see illustrations under order.

passable, worthy of being passed; passible: this spelling constitutes a word which, though unusual, has a meaning of its own: capable of feeling or suffering.

pendant (noun), a hanging ornament, as a locket or an earring; pendent (adjective), hanging; suspended.

peninsula, the noun;
peninsular, the adjective.

per cent, used to indicate rate in hundredths; as, six per cent;
percentage, the noun; as, it proved difficult to compute the exact percentage.

persecute, to pursue in order to injure; prosecute, to bring suit against or bring to trial.

pertinent, in a pertinent question, should not be confused with impertinent, although the meanings of the two words in this phrase approach each other. Impertinent has a derived meaning of impolite, which has become its commonest sense. Pertinent means bearing closely upon the matter in hand. On those occasions when a question bears directly upon a highly personal matter which it is hardly proper to approach otherwise than distantly, the expression a pertinent question may carry much the same implication as an impertinent question.

Note that pert, too, has much the same meaning as impertinent, though there is a suggestion of not unpleasing vivacity about the former term.

petition, a formal request; partition, separation; also, a separating wall within a building.

phosphorus, the noun;
phosphorous, the adjective.

pistol, the firearm;
pistil, the seed-bearing organ of a flower;
pistole, the coin.

Pluto, the god of the lower world;
Plutus, the god of riches;
Plato, the Greek philosopher.

pour, to cause to flow in a stream;
pore, to be absorbed in thought; also, a minute hole, as in a leaf or the skin.

practical, applicable to practice; workable under real, as opposed to ideal, conditions; practicable, capable under the existing conditions of being put into effect.

precipitous, very steep, like a cliff; descending rapidly; precipitate, rash; sudden.

prescribe, advise; order;
proscribe, condemn; forbid.

presumptive, affording ground for supposition: used chiefly as in presumptive evidence and in the expression heir presumptive (see presumptive in main vocabulary);
presumable, capable of being believed or taken for granted;
presumptuous, arrogant.

previous, former; prior: without the negative form imprevious;
pervious, admitting passage of a fluid: negative impervious.

principle (noun), a rule; principal (adjective), chief; also (noun), used in a number of senses in which the idea of "chief" is inherent, as, (1) the headmaster of a school; (2) the sum of money on which interest is computed; (3) a major participant in a crime, as opposed to an accessory; (4) an actor in a main part, as opposed to a member of the supporting cast, etc.

procession, the act of going forward; also, that which goes forward; precession, the act of going before others: used chiefly in the expression precession of the equinoxes (see precession in main vocabulary) and of gyroscopic action.

pronunciation, the correct selection, combination, and discrimination through stress, of sounds recognized in a given language; enunciation, the correct rendering of the sounds in a given language, often with respect to distinctness.

prophecy (prŏf'ĕ-sĭ), (noun), prediction;
prophesy (prŏf'ĕ-sī), (verb), to utter prophecy; predict.

See foretell, Syn., in main vocabulary.

proposal, an offer;
proposition, a statement presented for consideration. Avoid the loose use which has developed within commercial slang.

propose, to offer; sometimes, to offer as a declared intention;
purpose (verb), to form or have the intention.

quite, fully; completely;
quiet, free from noise; peaceful; at rest. The confusion here is chiefly one of spelling.

recipe, preferred of cookery; receipt, noun corresponding to the verb receive, with a number of special meanings (see main vocabulary); allowable also of cookery.

respectable, worthy of respect;
respectful, showing respect.

respectfully, in a manner indicative of respect; respectively, with due regard to position or order of mention.

Right: Yours respectfully.
Wrong: Yours respectively.
Right: The three parcels that I have mentioned were to go to Jones, Smith, and Brown respectively.

rout (rout), to put to flight; also, to root up; scoop out; bring to light; route (rōōt), to send by a certain way.

satiric, pertaining to or given to satire;
satyric, pertaining to or like a satyr.

sensuous, appealing to the senses (see sensuous, def. 1, in main vocabulary); sensual, relating to the grosser senses.

sewage, preferred for the waste matter;
sewerage, preferred, when a single word is to be used, for a sewage system.

singing (sĭng'ĭng), from the verb sing.
singeing (sĭnj'ĭng), from the verb singe.

There are two other pairs of verbs presenting a similar problem, each pair, however, involving one unusual verb. Springing, from the verb spring, is to be distinguished from springeing, from the uncommon verb springe (sprĭnj), meaning to snare. Likewise, tingeing (tĭnj'ĭng), from the verb tinge, is to be distinguished from tinging (tĭng'ĭng), from the uncommon verb ting, meaning to ring or tinkle. The form from tinge may also be spelled tinging (but pronounced tĭnj'ĭng), but tingeing is preferred.

sit, be seated; for various other meanings, see main vocabulary: mainly but not exclusively intransitive; set, to put; for various other meanings, see main vocabulary: mainly but not exclusively transitive.

solidity, the state of being solid, or hard and heavy; solidarity, the state of being united in opinion, effort, or purpose;
sodality, a fraternal organization.

specially, for a particular purpose; as a result of particular care; especially, in a high degree.

Right: Specially chosen as being especially durable.

specialty, something specially devised or given special attention; speciality, the quality of being special.

statue, image;
statute, enactment;
stature, height; growth;
status, condition.

stimulus, that which rouses the mind or senses: often used of a sense impression; stimulant, a remedy or agent regarded as producing increased functional activity; especially, an intoxicant.

suite (swēt), suit. For numerous detailed meanings see main vocabulary. Either may be used of a set of furniture or a set of rooms; suite is commoner in the latter sense.

therefore (thâr'fōr; thûr'-), for this or that reason; therefor (thâr-fôr'), in return for this or that: rather formal and not very common.

typographical, relating to printing or type;
topographical, relating to maps and charts.

empire, a nation the sovereign of which is an emperor.

unkept, not kept; sometimes, not kept up or tended;
unkempt, not combed; disheveled; slovenly.

valuable, of much value;
valued, appreciated; of recognized value.

venal, mercenary; corrupt;
venial, pardonable; trivial.

veracious, true; truthful;
voracious, ravenous; greedy.

vocation, preferred for one's primary or recognized calling or profession;
avocation, preferred for an interest secondary to the vocation, which may be a recreation, a hobby, or a second occupation.

waver, to flicker; also, hesitation; waiver, relinquishment of a right.

Chapter IX

LETTERS: THEIR COMPOSITION AND TONE

It is a far cry from the Amarna letters of Middle Egypt to modern business correspondence or to the more colorful social letter. Aside from the difference in mechanical make-up, the subject matter of the letters of the ancients had little to commend it to consideration today, if we can judge by the fragmentary examples left us, which are stripped of the courteous language of the modern letter.

Tone

Most of the letters written today pertain to business. Probably the business letter has contributed more to the growth of business than any other one thing. This is because the modern business letter is not a stereotyped form of expression employed by everyone who needs to communicate with his fellow men on topics pertaining to his vocation. The business letter today breathes personality—it has tone. It inevitably reflects the character of the writer, and it should be carefully adapted to the characteristics of the person to whom it is sent.

One would not think of writing a letter to a farmer about the purchase of harvesting machinery in the same juvenile tone that would be employed in a letter that attempts to sell to a youth a subscription to the American Boy. The appeal to the farmer must be made through his need of modern harvesting machinery, and argument must be substantiated by fact. Generalizations will not do. The farmer must be convinced of his need. The letter should not be couched in high-sounding phrases. Plain talk appeals to him, as does a matter-of-fact, frank tone. He will give consideration to a letter that guarantees value received and satisfaction.

On the other hand, a letter to a boy must be adapted to the mind of a boy. Its tone, language, and diction must produce the effect of simplicity. But it also must be dignified, and the appeal must be directed to the motives and instincts of boyhood.

Characteristics of a Good Business Letter

Much business correspondence today is dictated. It requires skill to be able to dictate a well-balanced letter, one that conveys to the reader the exact meaning which the dictator intends to convey, and which at the same time creates good will and friendship.

A good business letter is clear, concise, and courteous. It does not require rereading in order to be understood. A carefully planned letter is seldom vague or incoherent. If a letter is not understandable to the reader, it probably has been carelessly prepared. Unusual terms and technical expressions should be avoided.

The excessively long sentence is often responsible for involved statements that are difficult to read and to understand. On the other hand, the writer should not fill his letter with sentences that are too short. Of course there is no set limit to the length of a sentence, but if the reader is required to read sentences that are invariably long, his attention to the subject may be taxed to the limit; and when his attention begins to grow weak, he is likely to lose interest in the purpose of the letter.

The beginning sentence should give a hint of the purpose of the letter. It should contain something that will attract the reader's attention, something that will interest him. Stilted expressions, such as "Yours of the ninth instant received and contents duly noted," mean nothing and should be avoided. By using meaningless statements at the beginning of a letter, the writer misses the opportunity to arouse the reader's interest.

The sample letters which follow will serve to illustrate what is meant by stilted expressions. The first letter is a "dead-language" letter typical of many poor business letters. The phrases in italics are awkward or overworked expressions that should not find place in any letter.

Dear Reader:

We beg to call your attention to the fact that a part of this chapter is devoted to the question of letter lingo, in the hope that everyone who reads it will resolve that from now on and forevermore he will omit these time-worn expressions from his daily dictation.

When dictating an answer to an ordinary, everyday business letter, do you think it adds anything of interest to your message to tell your reader that you have duly received his favor of the 16th inst., and that same being to hand you wish to state in reply that . . . ?

Do you attach hereto the memorandum that you are sending him, or do you beg to hand it to him herewith? Do you believe that he will know exactly what you mean when you say that the matter to which he referred in his letter of recent date will have your immediate attention and that you will see to it that shipments are sent forward at the earliest possible moment?

In reply to these questions which are respectfully submitted herewith, would ask that you carefully note contents of this letter and observe how much of interest and sense such expressions add to the message itself. Due to the fact that these unnecessary flourishes are costing American business organizations many thousands of dollars daily, would suggest that your customer-reader would thank you in advance if you would omit them altogether and write him as though you considered him a normal human being.

Thanking you for your kind attention and trusting that you will follow the suggestions made in this communication, we wish to remain,

Courtesy the Boston Chamber of Commerce

Following is another example of what a business letter should not be. This is said to be the worst letter that ever was written.

Yours of the 27th inst. at hand and contents duly noted. In reply would say same shall receive our best attention at earliest possible moment. We take pleasure in handing you herewith our latest investment listings, attached hereto, as per your request. Through an oversight on the part of our mailing clerk, the statement sent in compliance with your esteemed favor of the 12th ult. was wrongly addressed and has accordingly been returned to us. Regret the delay thus caused but beg to be permitted to say that we take pleasure in enclosing duplicate herewith. At present writing we are unable to quote on Siberian securities, owing to unforeseen circumstances arising in connection with shipping, but beg to inform you that in so far as we are able to foresee, the old prices will prevail during the coming season. Whatever the case may be, we are pleased to advise you that quotation shall go forward to your address immediately on receipt of same at our office. Hoping this communication may prove satisfactory in every respect, assuring you of our best attention at all times, and awaiting your further commands, beg to remain . . .

In contrast to these two letters, following is a letter which shows that it was more carefully thought out. The writer knew what he wanted to say and he has said it in a simple, clear style.

My dear Mr. Jones:

Increasingly advertisers realize that their biggest mission is to educate. Let the public know all about your business, your factory, your product, and if your business, your factory, your product are what they should be, you are bound to prosper.

This has been the policy of the World Baking Company in the preparation of the year's schedule of trade-paper advertising reproduced in miniature in the attached booklet.

This miniature reproduction does not give the full effect of the originals as they appear in full size and full color in millers' and bakers' trade papers, but it does tell the story. It tells the story of the company, its ideals, its aspirations, its problems, and its methods of solving those problems.

It is the hope and belief of the officers and directors of this company that this recital will interest you as one of our stockholders. We feel that the booklet prepared by our advertising department contains a story of a business and a business institution which you will find well worth while perusing.

Very truly yours,
WORLD BAKING COMPANY

There can be no hard and fast rules set down about the content of the business letter. Its effectiveness depends very much upon the temperament of the writer and of the recipient. In any case, a business letter should be dignified and courteous. An occasion never arises for writing a letter that will offend. The business correspondent, no matter what the provocation may be, should remember that a letter can be a good business letter and at the same time be friendly. We all know that a friendly, courteous, painstaking effort to obtain an audience with a correspondent will go a long way toward establishing cordial business relations. Such letters always are taken as representative of the company from which they are received.

In its form, a business letter differs from a social letter only in having a slight additional degree of formality. Each has a specific message to convey and the principle of construction is the same. The business letter is as brief and explicit as possible without being curt. The social letter may be drawn out, through intimacy, to greater length.

The Mechanics of Letter Writing

A well-planned, carefully phrased letter requires an attractive form. Like the successful salesman, it must go forth in a garb "neat, not gaudy." It must be orderly in its make-up. It must give the appearance of careful preparation before going forth on its errand. It must make a favorable impression on its reader before he begins to read it. In other words, its "How do you do" to its recipient must be such as to win for it a cordial welcome.

The heading

The heading of the letter, with the exception of the date, is included in the letterhead. Sometimes the date is placed in the center of the sheet of paper, but more often at the right below the letterhead, with the last figure of the date marking the right-hand margin of the body of the letter. The date should give the year, month, and day, with the month written out, and the day of the month indicated in cardinal numerals. St, nd, rd, and th should not be used after a date: May 3, 1940, not May 3rd.

The salutation

The salutation is the complimentary greeting that is used to begin a letter. It should be placed two spaces below the inside address, flush with the margin. In business letters, the salutation always is followed by a colon, but in personal letters a comma may follow the salutation.

The form of the salutation will depend upon the relation between the person addressed and the writer. In business letters, Gentlemen, Ladies, Dear Sir, and Dear Madam are the most common salutations, the first two being used when addressing a company or corporation, the last two, when addressing one man or one woman.

If the person addressed is known personally to the writer, the forms Dear Mr. Webster or Dear Miss Roberts or Dear Mrs. Stevens may be used. When writing to a public official of high rank, the more formal salutation, Sir, is employed.

Following are the more commonly used forms of salutation.

Official
Sir:
Madam:

Formal
My dear Sir:
My dear Madam:
My dear Mr. Smith:
My dear Mrs. Smith:
My dear Miss Smith:

Semiformal
Dear Sir:
Dear Madam:
Gentlemen:
Ladies:

Informal
Dear Mr. Smith:
Dear Mrs. Smith:
Dear Miss Smith:

The inside address

The name and address of the company or the individual to whom the letter is addressed is written at the left of the letter page, slightly below the heading. There are two forms in common use: the block form, in which every line of the address begins flush with the margin; and the indented form. From the standpoint of utility, the block form is preferable, as it saves the time of the typist. Whichever form is used in the address should also be used in heading, signature, and envelope address. In the indented form, close or full punctuation may be used, but in the block form, open punctuation is usually adopted.

A title is used with the name of an individual: Mr., Mrs., Miss, Professor, Dr., Hon., Rev., Captain, Major, Dean, Ph.D., LL.D., or the like. If the letter is addressed to a company, no title is used if the name is followed by the words Company or Incorporated or their abbreviations. But if these words do not follow the name of the company, the abbreviation Messrs. is sometimes used. However, the use of this French abbreviation is more common in England and Canada than in the United States. In addressing a company or an individual, be sure to write the name exactly as the company or individual writes it. Do not take liberties with names. By doing so, you may offend.

Forms of address for distinguished individuals will be found on page 166.

Body of the letter

The body of the letter contains the real communication. The dictator should assist the typist in its arrangement by indicating the beginning of each paragraph. Paragraphing is of great importance, if for nothing else than for the artistic effect. It is equally important, however, in classifying the writer's ideas. Every paragraph should treat of one subject only. When the writer's thought changes, a new paragraph should be made.

Double spacing should be allowed between the salutation and the letter proper. Care should be used in determining the spacing and margins of the body of the letter.

The body of the letter should be so planned that the complimentary close and the signature will not be crowded into the lower margin. If more than one page is needed to complete the letter, the second sheet should be numbered at the top with the initials of the person to whom the letter is addressed, and the date; as, 2 – J.A.R. . . . . Jan. 2, 1940. If the first page has no letterhead, the second page should be numbered and the name of the writer should be written across the top of the page.

In interoffice correspondence, each paragraph may be labeled with its subject, or may be written on a separate sheet.

Paragraphs are usually begun with an indented line. Some writers prefer the block form or the "hanging indention," but these forms are for the most part looked upon as innovations. Double spaces are often left between the paragraphs if the body of the letter has been typed in single space.

The body of a letter must be carefully punctuated. Care must also be used in the spacing between words and lines, and in the division of words at the end of lines. The dictionary is everyone's safest guide in dividing words, as in spelling them.

The complimentary close

The complimentary close of a letter is a leave-taking of the person addressed, and is to a letter what "good-by" is to a personal parting. It is written or typed two or three spaces below the last line of the body of the letter, midway between the right and left margins. The form used should be appropriate to the person addressed. A list follows of the most common forms in use today.

Friendly	Business	Official
Sincerely yours	Yours truly	Respectfully
Yours sincerely	Truly yours	Respectfully yours

Friendly	Business	Informal
Cordially yours	Yours very truly	Yours gratefully
Faithfully yours	Very truly yours	Fraternally yours

Only the first word of the complimentary close is capitalized. A comma is placed after the last word.

The signature

As the word implies, the signature designates the writer, or the company he represents, or both. In the last case, the company name is typed, and the writer's name is written underneath it, with his official position typed at the right of, or beneath, his name. If the writer of the letter is not an executive, the word by is usually placed before his name.

No title should appear before a man's signature. If the writer be a married woman, the common form is

Frances Hill Devon
(Mrs. Philip Snowden Devon)

A widow writes her name exactly as she wrote it before the death of her husband. An unmarried woman usually writes her name with the word Miss in parentheses preceding it. A divorced woman may assume her maiden name with or without Mrs.; or she may retain her husband's name with Miss or Mrs.

The signature follows the complimentary close, one or two spaces directly below or to the right. It should follow the form, block or indented, which is used in the address. The name should be written plainly and always with the same use of initials and given name.

Examples of Types of Letters

Sales Letters

Dear Sir:

Popular imagination has ever been stirred by the colorful tales of English voyagers in Elizabethan times — Frobisher, Drake, Raleigh, and their fellows, braving the unknown Atlantic and bringing back precious freight of foreign wealth. No less thrilling are the deeds of those mighty Elizabethan adventurers into the countries of the mind, the men who brought into English speech and English literature the treasure-trove of foreign letters. To us, indeed, the Elizabethan Age would not be Elizabethan without Hoby and North and Florio!

How these men and others brought the Renaissance to England is the theme of a most attractive book, by Dr. F. O. Matthiessen of Harvard University, which we have just published with the title Translation: an Elizabethan Art.

By a detailed analysis of a representative group of Elizabethan translations, Doctor Matthiessen has been able to suggest the purpose and importance as well as the literary qualities of all these works. He has a deep appreciation of his originals and is therefore able to impart to his pages both vividness and interest. After reading him, you will agree that the Elizabethan translations are worthy of a high place in the history of English literature and deserve much credit for their help in developing the English language and in broadening the English mind. We commend the book to all faithful admirers of vigorous English prose.

Doctor Matthiessen's Translation: an Elizabethan Art is a volume of 242 pages. The price is $2.50 a copy, postpaid. We shall be glad to send you a copy, with invoice payable in thirty days.

Very truly yours,

Dear Madam:

What will be the prevailing colors in hosiery this season? Wouldn't you be pleased to have the word of an expert on this important question? We know you would, for you have taken the trouble to write to us concerning our advertisement in Vogue. You will, moreover, be pleased to learn that it is possible for you to see, in your own home, the first of this season's production of hosiery, and to learn what will be the newest shades.

Our colorists are in touch with the shoe and dress-goods experts all the time. They learn months in advance when a new shade is to appear in cloth or leather. This forethought means that our customers can always depend on Colonial Dame Hosiery.

It is not necessary for you to carry shoes or dresses downtown when you want to match them in hosiery. Simply send for me, and I will call at your house at your convenience with samples of our full line.

Put the inclosed card in the mail today if you want to see what will be stylish this spring.

Yours very truly,

Dear Sir:

Out in Yellowstone National Park the great geyser known as Old Faithful spouts a never-failing column of boiling water 150 feet into the air. It is estimated that 250,000 gallons of hot water are liberated with every play, and each play lasts from four to seven minutes.

Suppose that you could have a pipe line from "Old Faithful" to your house. Wouldn't it be fine to have all the hot water you could use without having to build a fire? You can enjoy just such a hot-water service if you install an Automatic Gas Water Heater.

This water heater is placed in the cellar and is connected with the water and gas supply. You never have to go near it or give it any attention whatever. The moment that you open any hot-water faucet in your house, the flow of water turns on and ignites the gas, and the water is heated as it runs.

Thousands of satisfied users know that this water heater operates with perfect satisfaction at all times, and gives piping-hot water at any time and in any quantity desired.

If you will let me know when it will be convenient for you to have me call, I shall be pleased to answer any questions and give you figures for installing this hot-water service in your home.

Very truly yours,

CREDIT LETTER

Dear Sir:

We thank you for the order which you have placed with our representative, Mr. Johnson.

We have not had the pleasure of doing business with you before, but we shall try to serve you so well that we can expect a continuance of your patronage.

As is customary with all business houses, we are obliged to seek information that will enable us to determine the amount of credit to which a new customer is entitled. To facilitate these investigations, we shall appreciate your giving us the names of a few houses with whom you have been dealing.

For your convenience in replying, we inclose an addressed, stamped envelope. May we hear from you by return mail?

Yours very truly,

COLLECTION LETTERS

Dear Mr. Benson:

In looking over the books this morning, I noticed that your bill for goods delivered in April has not been paid. The matter is not worrying me at all, but I thought you might be glad to have it brought to your attention. If convenient, perhaps you will send us a check before the close of the month.

Cordially yours,

ARNOLD WHEELER

Treasurer

Dear Sir:

We wish to call your attention to the inclosed statement of your account, which was due September 15.

We shall very much appreciate your check for the amount due, $317.63.

Very truly yours,

Dear Sir:

No doubt you have overlooked the statement of your overdue account, which we sent you September 21. We are confident that this reminder will bring the matter to your attention and that you will mail us at once your check for $317.63.

Very truly yours,

Dear Sir:

We dislike to annoy you, but your failure to give any attention to your overdue account, which amounts to $317.63, compels us to bring it to your attention again.

We hope that you will not make it necessary for us to write about this again, and that you will send us a remittance at once.

Very truly yours,

Dear Sir:

We still are without a remittance from you in settlement of our invoices of March 10 and July 15, 1931. We have called this matter to your attention several times, but have heard nothing from you.

When we accepted your order, we placed confidence in you. We still feel that this confidence is justified and that you will do your share toward upholding it. It is necessary, however, to point out that only by meeting its just obligations can a firm maintain its credit standing.

You surely cannot afford to sacrifice the good will of our house. It is worth a great deal to you, just as your good will is of tremendous value to us. Business is built upon this firm foundation of friendly trust.

We are hoping that you will make it possible for us to continue the confidence we placed in you, and that you will do your part toward maintaining cordial relations with us. We shall expect your remittance by an early mail.

Yours very truly,

LEGAL LETTER

Dear Sir:

We are returning by registered mail, as requested in your letter of March 31, the certificate for fifty shares of the Spencer Manufacturing Company's First Preferred Stock, which was registered in the name of Harriet L. Smith.

This certificate was returned by our New York correspondent with the statement that the following papers must be submitted to them before payment may be effected:

Certified copy of the will

New York State waiver
Signature of the executor guaranteed
Assignment of the Spencer Manufacturing Company erased and erasure guaranteed.

If you will have these papers prepared and will mail them to us, we shall be pleased to proceed with the collection.

Yours truly,

FOLLOW-UP LETTER

Dear Sir:

Did you ever have a good customer stop trading with you? If so, what did you do? Very likely you waited until you saw him again and then said to him, "We haven't sold you anything lately, Mr. Smith. Is anything the matter?"

You made a straight-from-the-shoulder attempt to find the real reason for his leaving you. Then Mr. Smith probably told you frankly his reasons. If they were just and you had made a mistake, you did your level best to straighten out the matter.

That is our attitude of mind in writing you this morning. We have not had an order from you for some time. We should like to know the "real reason why."

If we have failed to serve you properly in any way, we want to know it. Our efforts to serve in the best possible manner are always sincere. We know it is only by following this rule rigidly that we can hope to see our business grow as we should like to have it grow.

Put yourself in our place for a moment. Then turn this sheet over and answer this letter as you would like to have it answered if you had written. Be frank, for that is the kind of answer we want.

We await your reply with the deepest interest.

Very truly yours,

Gentlemen:

On June 9 I wrote you ordering sent to me one set of assortment #12 Fourth of July Fireworks, priced at $7.50, and I inclosed my check in payment. The canceled check was returned with my bank statement today, but the fireworks have not yet arrived.

Of course I realize the pressure of business upon you at this season in this department, but the goods ordered will naturally be of no use to me after next Saturday.

Will you please look the matter up, and send the goods through, marked Rush?

Subject: Nonarrival of goods

Dear Mr. Sampson:

Your letter of June 30, regarding the delay in delivering to you one set #12 Assorted Fireworks, has been referred to this department.

On consulting our files I find that your letter was received on June 11, and the order sheet is marked "Filled and forwarded June 17."

I have given personal directions that a duplicate set be sent to you today by express. If through any mischance this should not reach you by July 4, will you please return it at our expense, and let us return the amount of your check? We deeply regret that you have been subjected to this annoyance and disappointment.

Yours very truly,

Dear Madam:

We are informed by our representative who calls for your weekly orders of an error in your last order delivered September 1. We understand that you received a pint of grape juice instead of the jar of our Grapelade which you had ordered, and that you did not receive the one-half-pound box of Arrowroot Crackers. We regret this error very much.

If you do not wish to keep the grape juice, please have it returned to us for credit. We will also credit your account with the box of Arrowroot Crackers.

We assure you that we shall take every precaution to avoid errors of this nature in the future.

Very truly yours,
EDWARD ATWOOD

Dear Madam:

Evidently your goods have been lost on the way. We do not want you to be put to any further trouble, so we shall make a new shipment which we feel sure will reach you promptly, and we shall take up the matter with the transportation company ourselves. There will be no charges for you to pay on the new shipment.

After you have had the agent make a notation of the shortage, please send to us in the inclosed envelope the receipt which he gave you when you paid the charges. This will help us to take up the matter with his company.

If after you get one shipment, the other should arrive, please leave it at the station and return this letter to us with the notice you received from the agent.

Yours truly,

LETTERS OF INQUIRY

Gentlemen:

The students of the Media High School will give, in the early part of May, a play based on the story of the "Pied Piper of Hamelin." In advertising this play we should like to have printed posters bearing a picture of the Piper. For this purpose will you lend us the cuts of a picture printed on page 30 of a book published by you entitled The Pied Piper of Hamelin?

In case you cannot lend us the cuts, should you object if we have a flat cut made of the Piper?

The courtesy of a prompt reply will be greatly appreciated.

ANSWER TO INQUIRY

My dear Sir:

It is a genuine pleasure to learn of your interest in the Hamilton Course and Service.

Your interest will grow, I am sure, as you learn more about our work. Thousands of ambitious business men are using our Course and Service as a definite means of preparing for greater responsibilities and larger incomes.

Our representative, Mr. Smiley, is writing you today at considerable length, explaining just what we have to offer.

This note is merely to express my personal pleasure at receiving your inquiry, and my hope that you will find it possible to take advantage of the specially reduced fee now available.

LETTER OF APPLICATION

28 Merriam Avenue
Elyria, Colorado
June 23, 19—

Mr. B. R. Jackson
644 Main Street
Denver, Colorado
Dear Mr. Jackson:

In this morning's Denver Post I notice your advertisement for a boy to learn the business in a jewelry store. As I am just graduating from the Elyria High School, I wish to make application for the position.

I am eighteen years old and have the ordinary grammar- and high-school training. In high school I have taken a commercial course and have received good marks throughout the four years. During the summers, holidays, and on Saturdays for the last two years I have worked at Dow's Drug Store, in Elyria.

For further information, I refer you to:

Mr. Arthur C. Barnes
Principal, Elyria High School

Mr. F. J. Dow,
98 Shirley Street, Elyria

I shall be glad to call at your store for a personal interview at your convenience.

Yours truly,

Letter of Reference

Mr. John M. Haines
North High School
Rochester, New York

Dear Mr. Haines:

We have an application for a position from Paul H. Thompson, 917 Cottage Street, a graduate of your high school.

We shall appreciate very much any information that you may send us concerning him. We are interested in knowing particularly the kind of record he made in his studies and how he got along with his fellow students. Any other information you may wish to send us about him will be very much appreciated.

We inclose a stamped, addressed envelope for your reply.

Very truly yours,
Herman Collins

Letters of Recommendation

Mr. John T. Page

Dear Mr. Page:

Mr. John T. Byer has been employed as secretary to the President of this company for the past two years. He has proved himself accurate, painstaking, and thorough, and has shown remarkable understanding of business methods.

He leaves us of his own accord because he wishes to locate farther west. We most heartily recommend him for any position which he feels qualified to fill.

Very truly yours,

Miss Ellen Ransome, Director

New York City

Dear Miss Ransome:

I am glad of the opportunity of recommending Miss Edna Morton, who has been my secretary for two years. During the time she has been with me she has made herself almost indispensable to me in my work, and I greatly regret the circumstances which necessitate her leaving me and going to New York.

She is not only an expert stenographer, she is also — what is far more rare — an unusually intelligent and capable young woman, and I recommend her heartily to anyone who is fortunate enough to secure her services.

Sincerely yours,
JAMES PENHALLOW

My dear Mr. Bucannon:

I understand that there is, or is about to be, a vacancy in the position of cashier for this company. May I take the liberty of suggesting Mr. M. J. Fernon for promotion to that position?

Of his training and special qualifications for the position it would be presumptuous of me to speak, for you are better able to judge concerning them than I. I should like to call your attention to his long service with the company and to the high esteem in which he is held by all who have been associated with him. I feel sincerely that, all other considerations being equal, it would greatly aid the spirit of good will in the department were Mr. Fernon to receive the appointment.

Respectfully yours,

My dear Reid:

This will introduce my friend Mr. Robert Cabell, of this city, who will be in Chicago during July and August.

"Bob" Cabell is an A-1 tennis player — in fact, the champion of the Long Island Tennis Club. Knowing your interest in the game, I feel sure that you and he will hit it off. If you can put him up at the Bayside Club, you need not worry about winning that cup this summer.

At any rate, be sure that I shall appreciate any courtesies shown him.

Dear Mr. Thomas:

I am glad to introduce to you the bearer of this note, Mr. Fred Cooke, who is personnel manager for the Horton Steel Company of Pittsburgh.

I have known Mr. Cooke for a number of years, and believe he is one of the best men in his line in the country. You have doubtless heard of his "Welfare Bonus Plan."

He has another idea which seems to me just as big as the bonus plan, and I am sure you will be as interested in it as I am. He will tell you my answer to his proposal. Perhaps you will let me know what you think of the whole thing.

Sincerely yours,

Letter of Congratulation

Dear George:

Congratulations! I just learned of your good luck through John McCarthy. I should not say "good luck," for I am sure that you deserve the honor, and evidently the President feels as I do. All good wishes for your success.

Sincerely yours,
Boyd

Letters of Condolence

Dear Charles:

May I extend to you my sincere sympathy in your sorrow. A friendship such as existed between you and Jack is rare, and I can understand how deeply his passing must have affected you. Please call upon me for anything that I can do at this time.

Frank

Dear Sarah:

Words cannot express my sympathy for you in the loss of your mother. I am sure that your devotion to her and your efforts to make the last years of her life happy and carefree must be a source of consolation to you.

Rebecca

Dear Henry:

You have my deepest sympathy in the sorrow that has come to you. Your friendship with your father was unusually close, and I know what grief his loss must bring to you. I am sure that you have many pleasant memories of him to sustain you, and that you will find comfort in the memory of his love for you and of your filial devotion to him. Everyone admired him, and to me his sudden passing was a severe shock.

If there is anything that I can do to assist you at this sad time, please let me know.

Note. An informal invitation is always written by hand, usually by the hostess or her secretary.

Dear Anne:

Can you and Charles come to dinner with us on Tuesday, March the third? Billie and I want so much to see you both before we leave for our western trip.

We are also asking those delightful young Farrands — you remember falling in love with her at Jane Dorlon's bridge. I know Charles will like her husband, too.

Eight o'clock is the hour. We do hope you can make it.

Always yours,
Margaret

Informal Acceptance

Dear Margaret:

Charles and I are delighted to accept for Tuesday, the third, at eight. I'm eager to hear your plans for the trip and also to see pretty Mrs. Farrand again. Thank you for thinking of us.

With love,
Anne

Words and Expressions to Be Avoided When Writing a Letter

Above: The use of such expressions as the above statement is condemned by some authorities.

According to our records: Everyone knows that you get information from your records.

Advise: A greatly overworked word.

All forms of participial endings, such as trusting, hoping, thanking, wishing, with we remain, we are, etc., as, Thanking you in advance, we remain: Remember that the last sentence will generally leave its impression—good or bad. Make the closing sentence complete and direct; as, We shall appreciate an early reply.

Assuring you of our prompt attention: Should you use this if you were talking to your correspondent? Be natural.

Give a definite date when possible: we will ship your order tomorrow. Such an expression as We assure you that the matter will have our prompt attention may be used where a definite date cannot be given.

At an early date: This expression should be avoided.

At hand: Trite.

Attached find: If anything is attached to the letter, say attached is. Of course it will be found. It could not be attached under separate cover.

Attached hereto: Omit hereto.

Awaiting your further orders: Why not ask in a direct way?

Beg: in Beg to state
Beg to advise Beg to inform To beg means to ask something for nothing. If you are in the begging mood, these are apt statements, but surely you are not, even Beg to acknowledge — if you are wont to use these expressions.

Complaint: — A rather rough word to use in a letter. Express your regret over any unpleasant incident that may necessitate correspondence.

Contents duly noted: — An unnecessary space filler. These words are meaningless.

Dictated but not read (signed, or corrected): — Discourteous. Letter should be returned with notation, "Received but not read."

Even date or recent date: — To be clear, mention the exact date.

For your information wish to advise: — This expression sounds pretentious. Be natural and you will be more effective.

Hand you: — Send you is clearer. How can one hand anything to another in a letter?

Has come to hand: — If you answer a letter, the sender will know that his has been received.

I have before me your letter: — Your correspondent does not care where you have his letter.

Inclosed (enclosed) herewith: — Herewith is unnecessary.

Inclosed (enclosed) please find: — Use inclosed is. Arrange the inclosure so that the reader will find it.

Inclosed (enclosed) you will find:

Inclosed (enclosed) under separate cover: — Make a definite statement: We are sending to you by parcel post.

In due course: — Say definitely when you will do it.

In re: — Has no place in an English letter.

In reply wish to state: — Go ahead and say it.

Inst., prox., ult.: — Abbreviations of words borrowed from the Latin. It is more courteous to specialize in English, the language of your correspondent.

Kind: — A perfectly good word, but often misused in letter writing. Ordinary business correspondence is neither kind nor unkind.

Kindly: — You would not say an unkind thing in a letter. Do not imply it by using kindly.

Oblige: — Awkward. Resembles the last bow of a high-school declaimer.

Our Mr. Foster: It is better to say, Mr. Foster, our representative.

Per, as per: Appropriate in a Latin phrase, as per annum, per capita. For three dollars per day, say three dollars a day. As per should be avoided.

Please be advised that: Usually superfluous.

Proposition: Business slang; you mean proposal or undertaking.

Permit me to say: You may say anything you please on paper, without permission.

Referring to the matter:
Referring to your favor:
Regarding your communication of: Stilted ways of introducing a subject.

Same (as a pronoun): Much better to mention what you are writing about, or say it, they, etc.

State: An overworked verb. Use say.

The above subject:
Under the above subject: Why imply that you are backing up to find where you first started?

The writer wishes to say: Do not avoid I in this case. Write as you would speak.

This is in reply to:
This is to inform you: Perfectly obvious from the contents of your letter.

This letter is for the purpose of asking: Why not ask without all this preliminary?

Under separate cover: Rather tell how it is being sent—by mail, by parcel post, or by express.

Up to this writing: An awkward expression; avoid.

We or I: When speaking of a company, use we: when of an individual, use I. Avoid too frequent use of we or I, especially at the beginning of the letter itself or of sentences within the letter. But do not omit I when the sentence requires it.

We see by your letter: Someone has called this "a setting-up exercise," implying that the user of it is getting ready to think. He is sparring for time. Similar expressions are:

We take pleasure in sending you herewith:
We wish to call your attention to the fact that:
We wish to inform you that:
We wish to notify you that:
We wish to advise you:
We would advise:
Wish to say:	Do not omit the subject of a sentence.
Would say that:
Would ask that:
Would state:
You can get me on the phone:	You can reach me by telephone is much more dignified.

GAZETTEER AND ATLAS OF THE WORLD

The list given in this Gazetteer includes all names occurring in the Atlas of the World which follows, with a brief explanation of what each name refers to (whether city, lake, mountain range, or the like). The location is indicated in parentheses, in the form (17:H–7). In this form, the number in boldface indicates the map number as given in the upper outer corner of the map page; the letter and number in lightface refer to the key letters and numbers in the margin of each map, marking the small sections formed by the intersection of parallels and meridians. The symbol AM indicates the map of the Ancient Mediterranean, the first map of the series.

Populations are given in all cases in which recent authentic statistics are available. For the United States, the figures of the census of 1930 have been used; for Canada, of 1931.

The abbreviations used in this Gazetteer include those of the States of the United States, and the following additional abbreviations:
